The SECRETARY. In the clause making appropriations for "free-delivery service," on page 4, line 9, before the word "million," it is proposed to strike out "thirteen" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the appropriation $12,085,400.

Mr. MASON. One word upon the point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. QUAY. There is no point of order. It has been withdrawn.

Mr. MASON. Do I understand that the point of order has been ruled on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment concerning which the point of order has been made has been adopted, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] has now offered a new amendment reducing the gross amount for free-delivery service from $13,085,400 to $12,085,400.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest, if the Chair will allow me, that the Senator from Illinois ought to know that although the point of order is disposed of, it is still debatable, if he chooses to debate it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. I understand every question is debatable in this body at any time and under all circumstances, but I wish to understand the parliamentary situation, because I am opposed, and will give very briefly the reasons why I am opposed, to the amendment or suggestion of a change in the law which would prohibit postmasters from distributing mail according to their best judgment in the several cities. I think the Senator from South Carolina and other Senators who live in rural districts will understand that in a city like Chicago, which is both cosmopolitan and rural, we have in some parts of the city deliveries not exceeding two or three times a day, but there are some parts of a great city like Chicago where the business is congested, where it is at least as easy, if not easier and cheaper, to make more than three deliveries than it would be to make three.

In other words, take some of the large business blocks in the immediate center, near the post-office. One carrier can not deliver in three trips the mail that goes to his district on account of its size, but being accessible to the post-office——

Mr. TILLMAN. I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact, if he will allow me, that three deliveries are not provided for, but four. The amendment as adopted by the Senate is to provide for not exceeding four deliveries.

Mr. MASON. It is still an error, in my opinion, for the simple reason that there may be some parts of a city where, for instance, like the city of Chicago, 80 per cent of the great mail delivery of the city may be delivered in a square mile. Those are small districts, but the mail is very difficult to deliver, for the trains are coming in constantly; and the theory of delivery, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], is carried out. It does not cost any more to deliver promptly and quickly than it would to let the mail accumulate and hire two men to carry the great bulk of mail which goes into such a district. This is a practical question, which I think ought to be left to the postmasters of the country.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator sits down, if he will pardon me, I should like to make a suggestion to him about what he was saying, which was made to me by a very able and experienced business man.

Mr. MASON. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. A man can deliver by going seven times over his route all the mail that comes. If he can go over it only four times, it would require two men to make the delivery.

Mr. MASON. That is the point I have been making.

Mr. HOAR. Exactly.

Mr. MASON. The mail is so heavy at times that one man actually can not carry the load. I have seen a man almost struggling under these enormous deliveries, carrying more mail than a white man or a black man either ought to carry.

Mr. TILLMAN. That question has been settled by the Senate, and therefore it is a waste of time to discuss it; but I simply wish to remark that I am very sure that if it was found impracticable or too burdensome for one carrier to deliver all the mail within a certain limit in four deliveries, another man would be put on and thus reduce his beat, so to speak.

Mr. MASON. And increase the expenses.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; not increase the expense at all; but if it does, it will simply be an experiment along this line, and let the report come in next winter as to what has been the result of limiting the deliveries to four.

Mr. BUTLER. As the Senator from New Hampshire has modified his amendment so as to reduce the appropriation from $13,000,000 to $12,000,000, I should like to inquire what is the parliamentary situation now? Of course the limit then will be $12,000,000 instead of $13,000,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I so understand; that is, an ordinary conference committee would be limited, but I do not undertake to say what the conference committee between the two Houses will do.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me, would it not be wiser to make a reduction of say $3,000,000, instead of making a reduction of one million or one million and a half, so that the Department could not make the reduction below $10,000,000?

I hold in my hand copies of the Post-Office appropriation acts from 1885 to date. What was our appropriation for free deliveries in cities in 1885? Only $4,000,000. In 1890 it was $6,500,000, but since 1890 it has been jumping up with rapid strides. The increase is marvelous in all these appropriations; it is out of all proportion to the increase in our population, and it is out of proportion to the increase of business. Clearly $10,000,000 to-day is an enormous increase above the increase of population and business of the country.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator state what it was last year? He has the figures right there.

Mr. BUTLER. I will tell you in one moment. It was entirely too much last year. It has gotten up to $12,500,000.

Mr. President, I do not like to amend the Senator's motion, but I prefer to allow it to stand and take the sense of the Senate as to $10,000,000; and then the conference committee will have the opportunity of agreeing on some point between $10,000,000 and $13,000,000.

The reduction would be very slight indeed if there was no change in the conference, because we have trebled this amount in the last two years. As to the country, we are pulling up hill, but when you strike the cities, when we are willing to do everything that seems reasonable and fair, then we have a great many of our friends very anxious and in full force. It seems to me that we should be as careful in extending the facilities to all of our people as to a part, and should be as liberal to all as to a part. It seems to me that the Senate should be able to consider both with perfect equanimity and fairness. There should be no prejudice against the one or the other. This is not in any spirit of antagonism to the cities, but clearly these appropriations have outgrown all reason.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to state, in reply to the Senator from North Carolina, having reflected upon the subject, that I do not believe that reducing the deliveries in the cities to four times a day would save more than a million dollars. My belief is it would not, and therefore I will let my motion stand, although the Senator is at perfect liberty to move to decrease it still further.

Mr. QUAY. I suppose the Senate, in its present temper, is ready to adopt the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. Having adopted the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina without knowing what its effect is going to be upon the great interests of the great cities of this country, it is but natural that it would cut the appropriation by one million, three million, or five million dollars without inquiring what effect it will have upon the operations of the Department or what amount is actually necessary. Merely as a protest against this sort of blind and dumb legislation, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. QUAY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, page 4, it is proposed to strike out "thirteen" and insert "twelve;" so as to read:

Free-delivery service: For pay of letter carriers in offices already established, and for substitute letter carriers and for temporary carriers at summer resorts, holiday and election service, $12,085,400.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. ELKINS]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS].

Mr. KENNEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I therefore withhold my vote. Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PLATT of New York (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY]. Feeling perfectly confident his vote would be as mine upon this subject, and as the question is not political, I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] requested me to state that he is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. BUTLER (after having voted in the negative). I suggest to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY] that we transfer our pairs.

Mr. KENNEY. That is entirely agreeable.

Mr. BUTLER. I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. KENNEY. I vote "nay."

Mr. GEAR. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM. If it is necessary to make a quorum, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire whether the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] has voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Rhode Island has not voted.

Mr. BACON. I transfer the pair between the junior Senator from Rhode Island and myself to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], and will permit my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 29; as follows:

So the Senate refused to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. The adoption of that amendment necessitates another amendment, in line 23, in order to reduce the total $1,000,000.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the clerks do that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 23, page 4, it is proposed to strike out "thirteen" and insert "twelve."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEAR. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted as a new section.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as section 3½:

That semi-weekly newspapers shall be carried in the mails as second-class matter when mailed from the office in which they are published.

Mr. HALE. That is subject to the point of order.

Mr. QUAY. I make the point of order upon the amendment that it is general legislation.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GEAR. I should like to know the nature of the objection which the Senators make?

Mr. QUAY. That it is general legislation and can not be put upon an appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must sustain the point of order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 6, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1898, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 20 per cent per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight heretofore fixed and allowed by law.

Mr. QUAY. I also make the point of order on that amendment that it is general legislation.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to have the amendment printed and that the bill shall go over until to-morrow. This is a very important and a very large subject, and we have now been steadily considering the bill for about four and a half hours. I do not desire to go on to-night nor does the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], who wishes to address himself to this question.

Mr. QUAY. I should be very glad, if possible, to complete the bill to-night; but if it is absolutely necessary to accommodate the Senators——

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that if we could stay here for an hour or two and complete the bill, we could then, I think, without any question, naturally and properly take an adjournment over until Monday.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope not.

Mr. QUAY. I will say to the Senator that it is scarcely possible to adjourn until Monday. I think that element need not enter into what he may have to say as to proceeding with the consideration of the pending bill. So far as I am concerned, speaking for myself, I have no objection to the arrangement proposed by the Senator from South Dakota, to wit, that the bill shall go over until to-morrow and be taken up immediately after the morning business——

Mr. HALE. The routine morning business.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is satisfactory to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, and the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota will be printed.

Mr. QUAY. Unless there are some other amendments which will not provoke discussion, and if this is the only amendment pending. That is my understanding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to be offered to the bill?

Mr. QUAY. Let it be understood by unanimous consent that no other amendments will be offered to the bill to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. The Chair asked if there were further amendments to be offered to the bill. I have offered amendments to the bill which went to the Committee on Appropriations. They have not been reported. I want to offer them in the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. I do not understand what the Senator from North Carolina says.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall offer in the Senate the amendments which I proposed and which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and were not adopted by the committee.

Mr. QUAY. They can be presented to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. I take it that any amendment will be in order to-morrow. I should be unwilling to make an agreement to-night which would preclude the offering of other amendments. Let the bill remain open.

SUITS FOR PARTITION OF LANDS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4099) to confer jurisdiction upon the circuit courts in certain cases, and that the bill be put upon its passage. A similar bill has already passed the Senate unanimously, authorizing parties to bring suit for partition where the United States is one of the tenants. The House has passed a bill identically the same as the Senate bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It confers upon the several circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction of suits in equity brought by any tenant in common or joint tenant for the partition of lands in cases where the United States is one of such tenants in common or joint tenants, the suit to be brought in the circuit court of the district in which the land is situate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted the following report:

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the House provision numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment so as to read as follows:

"That any such company, by filing with the Secretary of the Interior a preliminary actual survey and plat of its proposed route, shall have the right, at any time within one year thereafter, to file the map and profile of definite location provided for in this act; and such preliminary survey and plat shall, during the said period of one year from the time of filing the same, have the effect to render all the lands on which said preliminary survey and plat shall pass subject to such right of way."

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

That the registers and receivers of public moneys in the land districts of Alaska shall each receive an annual salary of $1,500 and the fees provided by law for like officers in the State of Oregon, not to exceed, including such salary and fees, a total annual compensation of $3,000 for each of said officers.

QUARTERMASTER'S SUPPLIES, ETC.

Mr. HAWLEY. I call up for consideration the conference report upon the bill (H. R. 10121) to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut calls up the conference report indicated by him. The conference report is before the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, after a most thorough consideration of this bill by the Committee on Military Affairs, and especially by the subcommittee, consisting of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], and myself, we decided that we should be obliged to ask the Senate to proceed with the bill exactly as it is. There are certain things in it indispensable to the subdepartments of the War Department, and we find that the bill answers every reasonable requisition.

If the Senate will permit me, I will read a very brief and vigorous statement by the capable Quartermaster-General of the Army, General Ludington, approved by the Secretary of War and sent to the Senate:

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 23, 1898.

SIR: In view of the immediate requirements of the Army, and in order to supply it promptly during active hostilities, it is respectfully recommended that legislation be provided by Congress to suspend, until such time as hostilities shall cease, the provisions of law applicable to the Quartermaster's Department, as published in the annual appropriation acts for the support of the Army, viz, requiring advertisement before purchasing supplies, animals, etc.; limiting the amount to be paid for the hire of civilian employees to $1,000,000 annually, and that no employee of the Quartermaster's Department shall receive more than $150 per month; forbidding that the number of cavalry and artillery horses shall exceed the number of enlisted men and Indian scouts in the mounted service; that no part of the appropriation shall be paid for horses not purchased by contract, after competition duly invited, and inspected by the Quartermaster's Department; also limiting the number of draft animals to 5,000.

For the purchase and prompt delivery of supplies the requirements of the law now in force should be suspended or modified so as to permit purchases in open market.

The force of civilian employees must necessarily be largely increased, and in some instances in order to secure certain classes of employees, such as masters of vessels, special agents, etc., whose services could not be secured for such amount of pay ($150), it will be necessary to exceed that sum.

A reasonable reserve supply of cavalry and artillery horses should be kept on hand to supply losses as they occur, to keep up the efficiency of the cavalry and artillery arms of the service. To do this efficiently and promptly, the requirements of the law now in force should be suspended or so modified as to permit purchases in open market and an inspection by officers other than of the Quartermaster's Department properly designated by the Secretary of War.

The number of the draft animals must necessarily be increased, as the Army will, no doubt, be operating off lines of railroad, and in order to keep up its supply hauling by teams must be resorted to.

The suspension or modification of the prohibitory and limiting provisions of the laws referred to is absolutely necessary to enable the Department to conduct its business under existing emergencies, and immediate action by Congress is required to relieve this Department of the operations of said laws.

Very respectfully,

M. I. LUDINGTON,
Quartermaster-General United States Army.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

That is to say, briefly, we had an Army of 25,000 men, a long period of profound peace, and made very proper restrictions. Now we are raising from 125,000 to 135,000 men in addition to that Army, making 150,000 or 160,000, and putting an extraordinary stress of work upon this Department on their peace basis, and it is absolutely indispensable, in my judgment, that a bill like this should pass. We have studied it and looked over all of the provisions on the subject, beginning with the civil war and coming down to the present time, and we find that the measure we have presented is useful and we think necessary.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will have the last letter from the Quartermaster-General read.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; I will read a memorandum received to-day, in answer to my request this morning, from the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. COCKRELL. Send it to the desk to be read.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will pass it up to the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE, May 5, 1898.

In connection with the purchase of supplies for the Army, the Quartermaster's Department is handicapped by the act approved March 15, 1898 (Army bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899), and the previous Army appropriation act, by reason of the provisions therein contained, which require "That after advertisement all the supplies for the use of the various departments and posts of the Army and of the branches of the Army service shall hereafter be purchased where the same can be purchased the cheapest in the markets of the United States, quality and cost of transportation and the interests of the Government considered, except that purchases may be made in open market in the manner common among business men when the aggregate amount required does not exceed $300; but every such purchase shall be immediately reported to the Secretary of War."

It is the advertisement requirement before purchase when the sum exceeds $300 that this Department desires to be temporarily relieved of during hostilities. The requirements of the Army during a war are frequently such that they will admit of no delay whatever, and to be obliged always to comply with the existing law as to advertisement under extraordinary emergencies will delay this Department in the procurement of its supplies which are immediately required to meet the urgent needs of the Army. It is not the intention or the desire of the Quartermaster-General that the door should be so widely opened as to permit either abuse or fraud in connection with the purchase of supplies by this Department for the Army, but some relief from the operation of this and the other provisions of law mentioned in H. R. bill 10121, relating to this Department, is believed to be necessary in order that the public business pertaining to the Quartermaster's Department may be dispatched and every interest of the Army under emergencies promptly cared for.

The provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes, relative to purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the Departments of the Government, which was originally enacted during 1861, does not relieve this Department of the operation and requirements of the act approved March 15, 1898, above referred to, regarding advertisements, the provisions of which are now in full force and effect. The above is all that my letter called for as to the suspension of the advertisement feature.

M. I. LUDINGTON,
Quartermaster-General United States Army.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I wish to say only a few words. I have been trying to find out exactly the laws and regulations that were enacted during the last war. I find that on the 23d of June, 1860, a law was enacted which provided:

That all purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the Departments of the Government except for personal services, when the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of the article or articles, or performance of the service, shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same. When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency, the articles or service required may be procured by open purchase or contract at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold or such services engaged between individuals. No contract or purchase shall hereafter be made unless the same be authorized by law, or be under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in the War and Navy Departments for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year.

On the 21st day of February, 1861, by "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1862," the law of June 23, 1860, was repealed. On the 2d day of March, 1861, it was reenacted. It shows that people were then in the habit of changing their minds occasionally.

Mr. HALE. Is that the provision that is suspended?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will read it as it was enacted March 2, 1861. I believe there was no change at all in the language. It is section 10 of "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1862:"

That all purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the Departments of the Government, except for personal services, when the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of the article or articles, or performance of the service, shall be made by advertising, a sufficient time previously, for proposals respecting the same. When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency, the articles or service required may be procured by open purchase or contract at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold or such services engaged between individuals. No contract or purchase shall hereafter be made unless the same be authorized by law, or be under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in the War and Navy Departments for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year.

And then this provision is added:

And the third section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1861," shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. President, that was the law under which operations were had without any restriction, so far as I can find, until we come to the act of June 2, 1862. That was "An act to prevent and punish fraud on the part of officers intrusted with making of contracts for the Government;" and it provided:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, of the Secretary of the Navy——

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator state where in the statute book that is?

Mr. COCKRELL. Volume 12, page 411, Statutes at Large, act of June 2, 1862.

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, of the Secretary of the Navy, and of the Secretary of the Interior, immediately after the passage of this act, to cause and require every contract made by them, severally or on behalf of the Government, or by their officers under them appointed to make such contracts, to be reduced to writing and signed by the contracting parties with their names at the end thereof, a copy of which shall be filed by the officer making and signing the said contract in the "Returns Office" of the Department of the Interior (hereinafter established for that purpose) as soon after the contract is made as possible, and within thirty days, together with all bids, offers, and proposals to him made by persons to obtain the same, as also a copy of any advertisement he may have published inviting bids, offers, or proposals for the same; all the said copies and papers in relation to each contract to be attached together by a ribbon and seal, and numbered in regular order numerically, according to the number of papers composing the whole return.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the further duty of the said officer, before making his return, according to the first section of this act, to affix to the same his affidavit in the following form, sworn to before some magistrate having authority to administer oaths: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that the copy of contract hereto annexed is an exact copy of a contract made by me personally with ——; that I made the same fairly without any benefit or advantage to myself, or allowing any such benefit or advantage corruptly to the said ——, or any other person; and that the papers accompanying include all those relating to the said contract, as required by the statute in such case made and provided."

These contracts were kept for reference and for inspection. Section 4 of the same act provides:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, immediately after the passage of this act, to provide a fit and proper apartment in his Department, to be called the "Returns Office," within which to file the returns required by this act to be filed, and to appoint a clerk to attend to the same, who shall be entitled to an annual salary of $1,200, and whose duty it shall be to file all returns made to said office, so that the same may be of easy access, filing all returns made by the same officer in the same place, and numbering them as they are made in numerical order. He shall also provide and keep an index book, with the names of the contracting parties and the number of each and every contract opposite to the said names, etc.

I find again that July 16, 1862, volume 12, page 577, a law was passed entitled "An act to prevent members of Congress and officers of the Government of the United States from taking consideration for procuring contracts, office, or place from the United States, and for other purposes." That act prohibited them from being interested in any way and made it penal.

July 12, 1862, volume 12, page 604, "A resolution in relation to contracts with the United States" was approved. It is very peculiar, and contains the following provision:

That it shall be the duty of the several Executive Departments of the Government to publish, in one of the daily newspapers of the city of Washington, on Tuesday of each week, a list of all contracts which shall have been solicited or proposed to each, respectively, during the week next preceding, which list shall state briefly the subject-matter of each contract so solicited or proposed to be made, its terms, the name of the proposed contractor and of all persons known to be interested therein, directly or indirectly, and of all persons who solicit, request, or recommend the making of any such contract: Provided, That the foregoing provision shall not be applicable to bids in pursuance of advertisements for contracts or purchases made under existing laws, but shall apply to all proposed modifications of existing contracts.

I have examined the laws up to about the close of the year 1863, and these are the only laws I find in regard to the purchases to be made and the contracts to be let by the different Departments. The act of March 2, 1861, has substantially remained in force and is nearly the same as in the statute now, except that I do not think the part "no contract or purchase shall hereafter be made unless the same be authorized by law, or be under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment," is in the Revised Statutes, and the clause is not now in the statutes, "except in the War and Navy Departments for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year."

The Department says that this is a necessity, and the Quartermaster-General has given the reasons. His letter does not apply to the whole of the bill, but there are some provisions of the bill that are necessary beyond any question. The provision in regard to the purchase of horses is necessary. We know they must have more than the number specified in the law; and there are a number of other things. There is some question as to the propriety of the provision as to immediate delivery. I think most of the things would be covered by "immediate delivery;" but the Quartermaster-General does not think so, and thinks they will have to make contracts for other things beyond the time. I was not disposed to make any further contention. If I had drawn the bill I should have drawn it differently from what it is. But I think some enactment is absolutely necessary in the matter.

Mr. CULLOM. As I understand the Senator from Missouri, there is not very great difference between the present law and this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think there is; but you can not tell exactly the difference between laws unless you know how they were administered. A Department may construe a law in one way and issue regulations and rules under it, and pursue an entirely different course from what another Department would pursue at a different time.

Mr. CULLOM. A law ought to be administered according to its terms.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know, but I have read the language here. I do not know whether they construed this language here to mean that they could purchase all the clothing for the Army, and all the subsistence, and all the forage, and all the fuel, and all the quarters, and all the transportation, including not only transportation on railroads, but wagons, mules and horses, and everything necessary in transporting from one point to the other by wagon road or by water or by rail. I do not know how those things were construed. I understand from the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] that the word "transportation" is construed to mean not only the mere transportation of troops, but the means of transportation—wagons and harness and mules and horses, and everything of that kind.

Mr. PROCTOR. They all come under the general head of "transportation," and so does fuel also, because it was originally supplied by army teams.

Mr. CULLOM. Is it bought without advertisement or with it?

Mr. PROCTOR. It is bought in time of peace by advertisement. In 1861 it was exempted from that provision. The present bill is substantially like the law under which the war of 1861 was carried on.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I think it is impossible for us to get through with this bill to-night. I hope the Senator in charge of it will consent to have it go over and come up immediately after the routine business to-morrow morning, and let us now proceed to the consideration of executive business. If there is no objection, I will make that motion.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will just make one remark. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] spoke about the Army purchasing transportation supplies freely now. They could, except that there has been for some time a limitation on the number of draft animals to 5,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the language of the old law. I did not refer to that. I said that it was absolutely necessary that that restriction should be removed; but I meant what they would do under the old law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand. I am not hurting anybody's feelings, I think, when I say they have been absolutely compelled to violate the law in this and various other matters or to leave the country in a disgraceful condition in failing to provide for the organization of troops.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that what there is in this bill which ought to become a law should be put upon our statute books as soon as possible. I agree with him that section 3709 of the Revised Statutes should not be repealed. It occurred to me to ask the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] whether there could by agreement be a rejection of the conference committee's report, so that the conferees between now and Monday might agree upon a report eliminating that provision.

Mr. CULLOM. We shall be in session to-morrow.

Mr. GORMAN. The only objection I have to any provision in the bill is the one to which allusion has been made.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator object to any other provision in the bill?

Mr. GORMAN. I do not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not; but I have very serious objection to striking out——

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me ask my colleague on the committee whether that provision was not repealed shortly after it was enacted in 1861?

Mr. COCKRELL. The repeal of a law that is repealed amounts to nothing in legislation, as I understand it. That law has been repealed; and that section never ought to have been there.

Mr. CHANDLER. When was the law of 1861 repealed?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator has the number of the statute before him. He will remember the subsequent provision which repealed section 3709 and added another clause.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the revisers considered it in force, and therefore put it in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. GORMAN. And the Department considered it in force.

Mr. CHANDLER. And asks now to have it suspended.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is added to by the act of 1895, which takes away all the discretion of the Secretary of War and compels him to advertise.

Mr. HALE. That is the act of 1895.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; as I recollect it.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator from Maryland to yield to me that I may make a report from a committee.

Mr. GORMAN. I withdraw the motion, and yield to the Senator for that purpose.

ENLISTMENT OF CUBANS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4518) to provide for enlisting inhabitants of Cuba in the Army of the United States and accepting the services of Cuban volunteers during the existing war, and for relieving destitute women and children in Cuba, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments. It is a very short bill, and I think every Senator will approve of it. It will only take a moment to pass it, and I therefore ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. HAWLEY. Has the consideration of the other bill been laid aside?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; that was the understanding.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was not aware of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Maryland moved an executive session, but I thought we had better pass this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland requested that the conference report which was under consideration should be laid aside until to-morrow morning. Is there any objection to the request?

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will allow the bill which I have reported to pass.

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. The unanimous consent does not displace the measure in charge of the Senator from Connecticut.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee propose to amend the bill by striking out sections 1 and 2, as follows:

That during the existing war the operation and effect of all provisions of law which confine the eligibility to enlistment in the Army of the United States to citizens of the United States and persons of foreign birth who shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States under and in pursuance of the laws thereof, under 35 years of age, be, and they are hereby, suspended: Provided, That inhabitants of the Island of Cuba may be enlisted in the Army of the United States, at the discretion of the President, regardless of any limitations provided by law respecting, or on account of, the age of the party to be enlisted.

SEC. 2. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to accept the services, in the existing war, of independent volunteer troops, batteries, companies, regiments, or other military organizations, composed of inhabitants of the Island of Cuba, and muster them into the military service of the United States for a period of not less than one month nor more than two years: Provided, That when so mustered into the service of the United States they shall not be entitled to the pay and allowances, or other compensation, or any bounty, provided by law and regulations for the soldiers of the Army of the United States, but may be furnished such supplies, arms, ammunition, transportation, and other military aid as the officer of the United States Army commanding them may deem absolutely necessary at the time to enable them to perform effective military service: And provided further, That such service shall not entitle anyone to any benefits of the pension laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, insection (4) 2, line 6, after the word "available," to insert "and may enlist, not to exceed 50 for each brigade, inhabitants of the Island of Cuba, qualified to serve as interpreters, guides, scouts, and assistants;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That while serving in Cuba during the existing war, officers of the Army of the United States exercising separate commands may, by special order, cause subsistence, medical, and quartermaster's supplies to be issued to, and other aid rendered to, inhabitants of the Island of Cuba who are destitute and in imminent danger of perishing unless they receive the same.

SEC. 2. That the President and general officers commanding troops in Cuba are hereby authorized to furnish to the proper officers of the Cuban insurgents such arms, ammunition, equipments, and military stores and supplies as they may require to render the services of that army as allies in the existing war available; and may enlist, not to exceed fifty for each brigade, inhabitants of the Island of Cuba, qualified to serve as interpreters, guides, scouts, and assistants.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide assistance to the inhabitants of Cuba, and arms, munitions, and military stores to the insurgent forces, and for other purposes."

DISTINCTION BETWEEN OFFERED AND UNOFFERED LANDS.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senator from Maryland to yield to me that I may make a motion.

Mr. GORMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the bill (S. 1586) to provide for the sale of public lands in Missouri.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1586) to provide for the sale of public lands in Missouri, which will be stated.

The Secretary read the amendments of the House of Representatives, which were to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That in cases arising from and after the passage of this act the distinction now obtaining in the statutes between offered and unoffered lands shall no longer be made in passing upon subsisting preemption claims, in disposing of the public lands under the homestead laws, and under the timber and stone law of June 3, 1878, as extended by the act of August 4, 1892, but in all such cases hereafter arising the land in question shall be treated as unoffered, without regard to whether it may have actually been at some time offered or not, except in the State of Missouri, in which the lands are still subject to disposal at ordinary private cash entry; and the public land remaining undisposed of in that State shall be treated as offered, without regard to whether it may have actually been at some time offered or not.

And to amend the title so as to read: "A bill to abolish the distinction between offered and unoffered lands, and for other purposes."

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives with an amendment striking out all after the word "not" in line 11 to and including the word "not" in line 15, and transpose the sections so that the House amendment as amended will appear as section 1 and the original Senate bill will be section 2.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana moves to concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives with an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out after the word "not" in line 11 to and including the word "not" in line 15, as follows:

Except in the State of Missouri, in which the lands are still subject to disposal at ordinary private cash entry; and the public land remaining undisposed of in that State shall be treated as offered, without regard to whether it may have actually been at some time offered or not.

Mr. FRYE. Will it not be an easier way to agree to the request for a committee of conference and have the matter there arranged?

Mr. CARTER. The matter has been agreed to by all parties, and the bill is one in which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is interested.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the amendment submitted by the Senator from Montana is agreed to, that will end it, and that is the shorter way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana to concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives with an amendment which has been read.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I also move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the title; so as to make it read: "A bill to abolish the distinction between offered and unoffered lands, and for other purposes."

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GORMAN. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 6, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 5, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on page 5069 the RECORD states that "Mr. STEPHENS of Texas addressed the House. His remarks will appear hereafter." What I said was that I desired to call attention to the fact that this resolution, if passed, will raise revenue for railroad companies and not for the Government. And on page 5074, in answer to a question by Mr. KLEBERG, it says what I say is "I have read here a single petition from El Paso." It should be, "What I have said is contained in a petition from El Paso."

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the Journal. The point of order raised against the resolution was made by me, and not by Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk thinks the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] first made the point of order.

Mr. LANHAM. Not as to the privileged report. That was by myself. It is not material, however, but that was the fact.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] understand that he made the point of order?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The point of order was made by Mr. LANHAM.

The SPEAKER. The change will be made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much confusion that I have not understood one word of what has been done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] desired the Journal corrected so as to show that he made the point of order.

JOSIAH B. ORBISON.

Mr. SHOWALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3538) authorizing and directing the repayment to Josiah B. Orbison, of Donegal Township, Butler County, Pa., the sum of $300, with interest, that he paid to avoid the draft in 1863.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. CORLISS. Reserving the right to object, I would like to hear the report.

The report (by Mr. MAHON) was read at length.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, if I remember aright, I insisted on a former occasion that this bill should be considered in the usual way. I do not desire to object now, but I think it had better be considered in the usual way provided for by the rule.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ARKANSAS RIVER.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 4452, authorizing the Campbell-Lynch Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Webbers Falls, Ind. T.

The bill was read. It provides that it shall be lawful for the Campbell-Lynch Bridge Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Arkansas, its successors or assigns, to build, construct, and maintain a bridge and approaches thereto for the passage of wagons, cars, and vehicles of all kinds, for animals, horseback and foot passengers, across the Arkansas River at or near Webbers Falls, in said Cherokee Nation, Ind. T., upon and from the land owned, claimed, and occupied by William W. Campbell and Susan F. Lynch, members and citizens of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and the owners, claimants, and occupants of the land on both sides of the Arkansas River at the point where said bridge is to be built.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill if the proposition is intended to carry with it any obligation or appropriation on the part of the Government?

Mr. LITTLE. Not a dollar. It simply authorizes the construction of a bridge across this river.

Mr. MCEWAN. Reserving the right to object, I ask that the report of the committee be read, or that some explanation be made, because I could not hear any part of the reading of the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey that this simply authorizes the construction of a railway bridge across the Arkansas river; and I will state, further, that it is the unanimous report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The same bill has passed the Senate.

Mr. TALBERT. Do I understand that this is the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. LITTLE. It is the unanimous report of the committee, and has also the indorsement of the Secretary of War.

Mr. MCEWAN. I withdraw the objection to the bill, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CARRIERS ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4372) concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce, and their employees.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

Mr. MCEWAN. Mr. Speaker, I think I can save the time of the House by making objection to the consideration of the bill. I should like to have an opportunity of examining it before consent is given.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me, this is one of the labor bills. It has been considered by the House committee and is reported unanimously. All of the labor organizations throughout the United States are in favor of its passage; and their committees are now here waiting for the passage of the bill.

Mr. MCEWAN. That may be, Mr. Speaker; but this is a bill that deserves a little more careful consideration.

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). And the rights of labor organizations are not only observed by the bill, but it meets their approval, and they urge prompt action upon it.

Mr. MCEWAN. I will look into the bill myself if an opportunity is given.

Mr. HAY. I demand the regular order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Of course, if the gentleman from New Jersey desires to object, he has a perfect right to do so.

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Speaker, I must insist upon my right to determine for myself a question of this kind. The bill appears to be one of great importance, and ought not to be considered in this hasty manner, without any deliberation whatever having been given to it. It is a case, apparently, of "the Greeks bearing gifts," you know.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there objection, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded by the gentleman on the right.

GLEN ECHO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 924) to authorize the Washington and Glen Echo Railroad Company to obtain a right of way and construct tracks into the District of Columbia for a distance of 600 feet, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same amended as follows: In lieu of the proposed section insert the following as a proviso at the end of section 1:

"And provided further, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have the power to make and enforce all reasonable and usual regulations for the operation and maintenance of that portion of the line within the District of Columbia."

And the House agree to the same.

J. W. BABCOCK,
G. M. CURTIS,
JAS. D. RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

JAMES McMILLAN,
J. H. GALLINGER,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

Statement to accompany the report of the conferees on the part of the House on Senate bill No. 924.

The object of the bill is to permit a street railroad operating in Maryland to build and operate its line 600 feet within the District of Columbia.

The House adopted amendments specific in their terms as to the operation of the road and including details many of which are covered under previous acts. The conferees agree that the House recede from its amendments and adopt in lieu thereof a provision that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be authorized to make and enforce all reasonable and usual regulations for the operation and maintenance of the line within the District of Columbia.

J. W. BABCOCK,
G. M. CURTIS,
JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report of the conference committee was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my objection to the consideration of House bill No. 4872, which was called up by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Virginia has demanded the regular order.

Mr. LACEY. I call up the conference report, Mr. Speaker, which was under consideration on yesterday when the House adjourned. I refer to the bill relating to homesteads in Alaska.

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McEWAN. If an objection to a request such as that submitted by the gentleman from Ohio is withdrawn, does the demand for the regular order still stand as a barrier to the consideration of the proposition so called up?

The SPEAKER. The demand for the regular order, of course, is equivalent to an objection to any request for unanimous consent.

Mr. McEWAN. I understood the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. HAY. I have not withdrawn the demand, Mr. Speaker. I demanded the regular order after the gentleman from New Jersey had objected to the request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair understood.

Mr. McEWAN. Business having intervened, I will now ask unanimous consent that the House proceed to consider the bill called up by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I have called up the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa presents a privileged matter.

HOMESTEAD LAWS, ETC., ALASKA.

Mr. LACEY. I ask the House to proceed with the consideration of the bill which was being considered on yesterday at the time of adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5975) extending the homestead laws and providing for the right of way for railroads in the District of Alaska.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand for the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I am informed now by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] that he only desires a short time for the discussion of this matter, which I have no objection to. I therefore withdraw the demand for the previous question, and will see if we can not arrange some time when this debate shall be concluded and a vote be taken.

Mr. PITNEY. The proposition in regard to time, which the gentleman from Iowa and I have already discussed, will be satisfactory to me, if nobody else desires to be heard.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman from New Jersey suggests that twenty minutes be allowed on each side for debate.

Mr. PITNEY. I do not know whether any other gentleman desires to be heard.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. PITNEY. Then I suggest that we allow thirty minutes on each side. I will not occupy all that time on my side unless I am interrupted.

Mr. LACEY. Let it be thirty minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing thirty minutes' debate on each side?

Mr. LACEY. I would be glad if the time could be controlled by the gentleman from New Jersey and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing thirty minutes' debate on each side, the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY]? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to occupy the position of antagonizing this project for constructing railway lines in the valuable District of Alaska, but I think the proper safeguards ought to be put around the rights of way which may be granted. My attention was called to this matter upon the introduction of the bill in the House of Representatives, and in the form the bill then passed I had no objection to it. Yesterday, when the conference report came up for consideration, it struck me that a number of new matters had been imported into the bill, and no explanation intelligible to members generally was made on those matters.

I therefore took the position of objecting to the immediate disposition of the matter. I have since given some attention to it, and the result of my examination is that I am confirmed in the judgment that I formed yesterday. I was correct in my impression that a number of new matters, absolutely new, have been imported into this bill as the result of the action of the committee of conference. One of them is a proposition to give to the holders of scrip issued under what is known as "soldiers' additional rights" the privilege of locating such scrip in Alaska. There was nothing in the bill as it passed the House or the Senate that made this a proper subject for the action of the conference committee.

Mr. LOUD. Is the statement just made by the gentleman absolutely correct? I should like to know, because yesterday when that statement was made by myself, it was denied by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. My recollection is that that was provided for in the Senate.

Mr. LOUD. It was not; and it does not appear in the Senate print of the bill.

Mr. LACEY. It was a Senatorial proposition.

Mr. PITNEY. If it was a Senatorial proposition, it must have been defeated in the Senate, because it is not included in the print of the bill as passed by the Senate.

Now, it is well known, and it is admitted by the gentleman from Iowa, that this soldiers' scrip is not held by soldiers. It is impossible to tell by whom it is held. It has been held by speculators in greater or less amounts; and there is no reason why we should give the holders of this scrip a right which was not contemplated by the law which authorized the issuance of the scrip—namely, the right to locate land in the District of Alaska.

Mr. Speaker, I was also right in my contention that section 13 as included in the conference report is absolutely new matter. Nothing in the bill as it passed either the House or the Senate gave jurisdiction to the conference committee to adopt the section. I was mistaken as to the part of the old section 13 to which I referred yesterday when I said that it contained the only grant of authority in the Senate amendments to citizens of the Dominion of Canada. The part which I should have read was the beginning of section 13 as inserted by the Senate under amendment 56, which reads as follows:

That under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the privilege of entering goods, wares, and merchandise in bond or of placing them in bonded warehouses at the port of Wrangell, in the District of Alaska, and of withdrawing the same for exportation to any place in British Columbia or the Northwest Territory without payment of duty, is hereby granted to the Government of the Dominion of Canada and its citizens or citizens of the United States whenever and so long as it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President of the United States—

Reciting certain privileges that our citizens are to have in the Dominion of Canada as a condition of the grant.

Mr. Speaker, that provision is left in the bill by the conference report and it is subjected to restrictions less stringent than those inserted by the Senate. The only restriction upon that provision which the conference committee leaves in the old section 13 (now the new section 14) is this:

That corresponding privileges have been and are being granted by the Government of the Dominion of Canada in respect of goods, wares, and merchandise passing through the territory of the Dominion of Canada to any point in the District of Alaska from any point in said District.

Now, that bonding privilege, which the Senate put in by amendment 56, is left in by the conference report; and it is not subjected to so many restrictions as the Senate put upon it. But that section 13 has now been made section 14; and a new section 13 has been inserted, which was not passed or considered in either the House or the Senate, and was not properly the subject of conference between the two Houses. That is what I read to the House yesterday.

That native-born citizens of the Dominion of Canada shall be accorded in said District of Alaska the same mining rights and privileges accorded to citizens of the United States in British Columbia and the Northwest Territory by the laws of the Dominion of Canada or the local laws, rules, and regulations; but no greater rights shall be thus accorded than citizens of the United States or persons who have declared their intention to become such may enjoy in said District of Alaska; and the Secretary of the Interior shall from time to time promulgate and enforce rules and regulations to carry this provision into effect.

The bonding privilege, as I said yesterday, was a trading privilege. But the conference report gives to residents of Canada mining privileges in the territory of the United States. It is a new proposition. It may be necessary; it may be advisable, or it may not be. But the fact to which I call attention is that we are here importing into a statute of the United States, for the benefit of British subjects, the provisions and restrictions not only of the laws governing the Dominion of Canada, but rules and regulations that may at any time be made by the Dominion Government; and this proposition has not been considered in either the House or the Senate, or by any committee in either the House or the Senate.

I am opposed to that kind of legislation. If I had time, I could give the reason for my opposition. In my own State we have constitutional provisions which absolutely prevent any such legislation as that being enacted. It is necessary with us that the section to be made law shall be recited at length. That is not done here. No member of this House knows what are the provisions of the laws of the Dominion of Canada upon this subject, or what privileges are given to the citizens of the Dominion of Canada in the territory of the United States of America, by this new section 13, this conference section.

Now, there is another and very serious matter, it seems to me, wherein the conference committee themselves are absolutely mistaken as to the effect of their report and absolutely mistaken in their written statement furnished in obedience to the rules of this House. I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] will listen to me. They are mistaken also in their verbal explanations made on the floor. Page 4507 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 2, 1898, contains a copy of the statement of the House conferees, and the second paragraph of it is as follows:

2. Terminals and junction stations on railways are increased from 20 acres to 60 by the conference report, but the companies must pay for 40 acres of the same at the rate of $1.25 per acre. It is also provided that such stations shall not cover more than 80 rods of frontage on any shore line.

Mr. LACEY. It is printed a dollar in the RECORD. That is a misprint.

Mr. PITNEY. In the conference report itself there is not a dollar nor a cent. The conference report gives terminal facilities to the railroads absolutely free of cost. That is the result of the conference action upon amendment No. 12.

Mr. LOUD. A result of hasty legislation.

Mr. PITNEY. It is not legislation.

Mr. LOUD. Attempted legislation.

Mr. PITNEY. Amendment No. 12 increased by 20 acres the amount of land that a railroad could have for terminals. The House adopted 20 acres for stations, and one station for every 10 miles of road. The Senate said 20 acres more for terminals. The conference says 40 acres more for terminals. That was not a compromise of difference between the House and the Senate. The House said 20 acres and the Senate said 40 acres and the conference committee say 60 acres. But the statement of the House conferees to us is, that while the railroad companies are to have 60 acres, they are to pay a dollar and a quarter an acre. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] now says it means a dollar.

Mr. LACEY. No; I say it is printed in the RECORD this morning, a dollar.

Mr. PITNEY. It was printed in the RECORD yesterday, a dollar and a quarter.

Mr. LACEY. In my speech, at least.

Mr. PITNEY. Very well. Amendment No. 12 contained a provision that a railroad company might take for terminal purposes 40 acres at $1.25 per acre, to be limited on navigable waters to 80 rods on the shore line. The conference report states that on amendment No. 12 the House recede and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

What was the matter inserted by the amendment? It was a provision that a dollar and a quarter an acre should be paid for land used for terminal facilities. They strike that out and insert what the conference committee agree to; and what is it?

Additional 40 acres to be limited on navigable waters to 80 rods on the shore line.

Mr. GREENE. Does the gentleman say that nothing at all is to be paid for this land?

Mr. PITNEY. Not by railroads.

Mr. GREENE. That is what I am asking.

Mr. PITNEY. For aerial lines and tramroads they are to pay a dollar and a quarter an acre for 5-acre terminals or 5-acre stations, with the privilege of having stations every 5 miles; but railroads are permitted to take 200 feet wide without paying for their right of way, to take a station of 20 acres for every 10 miles without pay, and to take for terminals and junction points, where two railroads intersect, an additional 40 acres, making 60 acres in all for junctions and terminals without pay.

Mr. GREENE. And that exceeds by 20 acres what the Senate granted and by 40 acres what the House granted.

Mr. PITNEY. It does with regard to junction and terminal points on railroads.

Now, I do not suppose the conference committee intended that. I do not suppose they intended to mislead the House. When they made the statement that the railroads were to pay $1.25 an acre for this land, I do not suppose the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] or the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] intended to mislead the House. That is only another evidence of the haste in which the conference report has been drawn and the danger that we are in when conferees report on questions outside of matters in dispute between the two Houses.

As to the general scope of the bill, I think there are some things in it decidedly dangerous. I do not pretend to be a public-land lawyer or legislator, and I am not dogmatic in my statements; but I do think it is very dangerous to apply the homestead laws to the District of Alaska, which is not an organized Territory, where the land for the most part is not adapted in any wise to agriculture, and the conformation of which, the topography of which, is entirely different from anything in the prairies of the West. The value of the lands in Alaska depends upon their frontage on the water and upon their commanding the passes through the mountains.

The defiles through the mountains are the wealth of the country, or rather they enable those who control the defiles to lay a toll on the wealth that comes from Alaska. This bill reserves to a railroad company or a tramway company organized under this act an equal privilege in a defile or mountain pass; but if a wagon road has been built there already by people who did go in there in good faith and develop the country before this act was introduced, this will permit a railroad company or a tramroad company to go in and wipe out the wagon road and control the defile or pass through the mountains. Every wagon road that goes through the mountain passes may be obliterated for the benefit of the corporations taking a franchise under this act.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Has the gentleman's attention been called to amendment No. 3, that gives to a railroad running through these passes a hundred feet on either side?

Mr. PITNEY. Yes, 200 feet.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. And when it goes through a narrow pass it is provided that any other road can use its tracks; but there is no provision, which ought to be there, to let the other road build through that pass if it does not interfere with the road already built.

Mr. SHAFROTH. You can always do that under the right of eminent domain.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Not on the 200 feet.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, on the 200 feet.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not agree with the gentleman in that.

Mr. PITNEY. On page 5, in section 3, it will appear that the House of Representatives reserved the right of another railroad or of a wagon road to the common use of the pass. Now, the House conferees have acceded to the amendment of the Senate which strikes out the provision which allows a wagon-road company to have that right, and that privilege is therefore taken away; and when a railroad goes through a pass the rights of wagon roads are taken away from those who have been the pioneers in the development of the wealth of Alaska.

The bill as it comes out of the conference also permits the railroad company to take away from the bona fide settler the land occupied by him, even if he has purchased it. The Senate put in an amendment exempting appropriated and occupied land from the operation of the railroad grant. The conference committee have struck that out, and have left it now so that the railroad companies can take the lands whether they be appropriated and occupied by bona fide settlers or not.

Mr. MARSH. On the right of way or off?

Mr. PITNEY. For both.

Mr. Speaker, this bill only requires the railroad company in order to preserve its franchise to build a paltry 20 miles of railroad per annum. I presume that any railroad that will be adequate to get access to the gold-bearing regions of Alaska must be at least a thousand miles long.

Mr. ELLIS. Three hundred and thirty-seven miles will take it from tide water to the Yukon.

Mr. PITNEY. I am very glad to learn it is so short a distance. I am very glad that there will be some chance of securing the necessary transportation; but if it is 300 miles, under this bill they can take fifteen years in the construction. What does it mean? It means that a railroad company can make its preliminary survey and claim the 200 feet all through that country, and also station privileges, and then by building 20 miles a year can preserve the franchise.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir; the act provides that the road shall be completed in four years, or the right of way is forfeited.

Mr. PITNEY. One moment. Let us see whether we are right about this.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is in there.

Mr. PITNEY. I do not claim to know exactly what it is. Is the gentleman able to tell me where it is?

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are some twenty-odd pages, and I can not carry it all in mind.

Mr. PITNEY. Yes; and some fifty-six amendments, which add very much to the complication. I do not pretend, Mr. Speaker, to give a thorough discussion of this bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. On page 8, line 14, will be found the four-year provision, and under it a railroad could tie up Alaska by simply filing a survey and going ahead in that way.

Mr. PITNEY (reading)—

That any company desiring to secure the benefits of this act shall, within twelve months after filing the preliminary map of location of its road as hereinbefore prescribed, whether upon surveyed or unsurveyed lands, file with the register of the land office for the district where such land is located a map and profile of at least a 20-mile section of its road, or a profile of its entire road if less than 20 miles, as definitely fixed, and shall thereafter each year definitely locate and file a map of such location as aforesaid of not less than 20 miles additional of its line of road until the entire road has been thus definitely located.

Now, upon filing their preliminary map, they secure a franchise, and the franchise gives them the privilege of a right of way of a hundred feet on each side of the tracks between the termini of the road, and that franchise is preserved by building 20 miles per year.

Again, the bill does not require that the rates of transportation on the railroad shall be previously submitted to any public tribunal, either the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Secretary of the Interior; it only provides that they shall be published, and the Secretary shall have the right to revise and amend them from time to time. It amounts to a pro tanto repeal of the interstate-commerce law.

Now, gentlemen who may know this matter better than I may further discuss it pro and con. I only wish to urge that, since the conference report contains a great deal of matter that was not properly before that committee, that has been put in by that committee without authority, the bill ought to be returned to the conference for the purpose of having the matter properly digested.

How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nineteen minutes remaining.

Mr. PITNEY. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LACEY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give, as well as I can, an explanation of the provisions of this bill. The bill as it passed the House of Representatives had two objects in view: First, the extension of the homestead laws to the District of Alaska, and second, the granting of rights of way for the building of railroads in that District.

In that shape the bill passed the House of Representatives. It went to the Senate, and was there amended. There was in the Senate a gentleman having a great deal of knowledge concerning the doings in Alaska—Senator CARTER, of Montana. In 1891-92 he was Commissioner of the General Land Office, and consequently knew in what respect the act of 1891, which gave to trading corporations the right to locate certain lands, had been abused. Knowing that this bill related to the subject of public lands, he proposed certain amendments which should be placed in it, so as to curb certain corporations in Alaska that had attempted to abuse the laws of the United States in the location of lands upon the shores of navigable rivers. Thereupon numerous amendments were added to the bill.

Every amendment added was germane except one, and that was put in by certain gentlemen from New England. It had relation to fishery rights and the regulation of such rights between the United States and Canada. We did not want that amendment in the bill; we tried to avoid it in every possible manner. We reported the matter to this House, supposing it would be satisfactory, and the amendment was ruled out on a point of order. Now the bill comes back with matter which is germane to the original bill except a small provision concerning goods transported across Alaska, which was placed in the bill by the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, the first section of this bill provides that the homestead rights of the United States, as they exist under our laws, be extended to the District of Alaska. There are no land laws applicable to the District of Alaska at the present time except the mineral-land laws and the laws allowing trading corporations, for the purpose of conducting their business, to locate 160 acres of land in square form, upon paying $2.50 per acre therefor.

Mr. LOUD. And the town-site laws.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And the town-site laws. Under the act of 1891 various corporations attempted to locate tracts of land of 160 acres each, not substantially in square form, but in a shoestring form, extending a long distance on the shore front, and thus making 160 acres cover 1 mile or more of shore land. Corporations erected upon the land thus taken their canneries, and, in order to extend their monopoly still further——

Mr. PITNEY. If that is the only effect of the bill, I wish to say that I have not criticised those provisions at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am trying to give an explanation of the whole measure, because there have been various statements here that no explanation has been made concerning the bill.

These gentlemen, in order to get further shore rights, located a number of canneries on separate tracts of land, while practically operating but one. Thus there would be six or seven canneries covering the shore front for a good many miles owned by one company. The law gave the right of location only for business purposes and not for monopoly. The excuse given was that if one cannery should be burned they could occupy at once another and not let their supply of fish spoil on their hands.

The Senator from Montana had become cognizant of these evils while he was Commissioner of the Land Office, and therefore this bill was enlarged so as to include various sections which would prevent any such monopoly. Section 1, as I have stated, relates to the extension of homestead rights to the District of Alaska. There is a limitation upon those rights. In order to protect the shore frontage it was provided that they should extend only 80 rods along the shore front. But if the homestead is located in the interior on agricultural or grazing lands, the homesteader is entitled as in the United States to 160 acres.

Mr. PITNEY. Does the gentleman mean that the homesteader is entitled to 160 acres of mining as well as agricultural land?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not mining lands—agricultural or grazing lands.

Mr. PITNEY. Where does the gentleman find that provision?

Mr. SHAFROTH. On page 2—the fourth amendment.

And it is further provided, That no homestead shall exceed 80 acres unless it be located on meadow land or land chiefly valuable for grazing or agricultural purposes, of which 160 acres may be entered as a homestead under the general land laws of the United States.

Mr. PITNEY. Was the gentleman one of the conferees on this bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. PITNEY. But the conference report strikes out "80" and inserts "40," and also strikes out the restrictions with regard to mineral lands and land used for agricultural purposes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not that part.

Mr. PITNEY. Yes, it does.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the conference report.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman from Colorado will remember that the original amendment was postponed. We first agreed on 160 acres; finally only 80 acres was agreed upon; and it was left at 80 acres, but without this provision.

Mr. PITNEY. If the conferees themselves do not know what are the provisions of the bill as now reported, it is no wonder that the rest of us do not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. At the last meeting of the conferees which I attended they agreed to let this provision remain in the bill. If they subsequently changed the provision it was without my knowledge.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman was not present at the last conference, when the papers were finally made up.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the provision should be 160 acres. I always thought so, and I think so still.

But of course there have to be some concessions on the part of the members of both bodies with reference to the disagreements of the two Houses; and if we can not get 160 acres, we should take 80 acres, so as to settle the matter and give the homesteaders some standing in Alaska.

The second section of the bill provides for the granting of rights of way to railroads in that region. The bill as it passed the House provided for such rights of way, and the Senate made certain amendments limiting such provisions, which amendments formed a subject of controversy between the two Houses, and were taken into consideration by the conference committee.

Mr. PITNEY. If the gentleman will allow an interruption, has he passed beyond amendment No. 4? The amendment, he will perceive, relates to the number of acres—160 acres to be allowed in these cases.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It gives 80 acres for homestead purposes. The amendment provides that no homesteads shall exceed 80 acres in extent. Originally it provided for 160 acres to each homestead claim. The Senate amendment reduced it to 40 acres. But this provision came into controversy and was amended so as to read 80 acres.

Mr. PITNEY. But 160 acres were allowed to the canning factories, were they not?

Mr. GAINES. That is just the point I desire to ask the gentleman about. Why should you make such a distinction?

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is no distinction, the gentleman will observe, if he scans the provisions of the conference report. The number of acres in the homestead provision and the cannery provision has been cut exactly in two in the conference report.

Mr. PITNEY. Under what law is this allowance made?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Under the law of 1891; and they have had the right under that law to take up this land on the payment of $2.50 an acre.

Mr. GAINES. What rights were carried under that law?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am referring now especially to the canners of fish.

Mr. GAINES. And what did they get?

Mr. SHAFROTH. They were entitled under that law to 160 acres of land substantially in square form. This bill provides that such locations shall be separated from each other, so as to prevent a continuous occupation of the shore line.

Mr. GAINES. How much of this land do the canning factories take up per factory?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Under the provisions of this bill they get 80 acres, if they desire to take up that much.

Mr. FOOTE. The canning factories get 80 acres. Does the farmer get 160 acres of the meadow lands?

Mr. GAINES. I understood the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] to state that the canning man gets more than the farmer?

Mr. PITNEY. No; the farmer gets one-half as much as was originally provided in the bill, under the amendments of the Senate as agreed to by the conference——

Mr. SHAFROTH. For my own part, I think there should be a uniform rule of 160 acres.

Mr. GAINES. To whom?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, to the homesteader and to the canner also. But I think the restriction we impose, that there should be 80 rods distance intervening between the location of the canning establishments, is a good one, so that the canner can not occupy the entire shore line, and string out his 80 acres or 160 acres in a long line along the shore and thus monopolize the navigable waters.

The House wanted 160 acres as a homestead or cannery claim; the Senate reduced that amount to 40 acres. Now, as a compromise, 80 acres have been substituted by the conference committee. We also provided, as I have just stated, that a space of 80 rods on the water front must intervene between claims, which shall remain in the United States for the use of the people desiring to use the water front.

Mr. GREENE. Why, then, the necessity, let me ask the gentleman, for enlarging the amount that the railroad companies get?

Mr. SHAFROTH. We do not enlarge it to any considerable extent.

Mr. GAINES. For what do they want it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, the lands allowed to the railroad companies are for terminal facilities and for depot purposes. It is provided that the roads shall be entitled, in addition to the 20 acres, to certain rights for depot purposes at the termini.

Mr. GAINES. For what purpose?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Absolutely for railroad purposes; for turnouts and depots.

Mr. GAINES. Do they want to make a town of it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no. They must have this land for machine shops and other necessary purposes.

Mr. GAINES. What! Forty acres for machine shops?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Possibly not exclusively for that purpose; but the gentleman must remember that the railroad companies require a great deal of land for turn-outs, switches, depots, warehouses, and so on. A railroad company in my own town has 320 acres, and they seem to need it all.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. A railroad company in my city has 320 acres, and it has a number of tracks, shops, and other buildings scattered over the same. That land is very valuable, and if they did not need it they surely would sell it.

Mr. GREENE. Will they put up shops at every railroad crossing and terminal?

Mr. SHAFROTH. How many railroad crossings and terminals are they going to have in that country? The probability is there will be no crossings at all. The truth is, when you compare the legislation of this country with the legislation of Canada concerning railroads in that region, I do not see how any road is going to be built on American territory. The bill that has passed at least one branch of the Canadian Parliament gives to the railroad companies alternate sections for 9 miles on each side of the road, as a gift, as an inducement for them to locate and build the road on British territory. If there is going to be such laws as that passed in Canada, you will find that the railroads, guided by self-interest, will be built on Canadian soil, and none will be built on ours. Is it wise to so restrict the terminal facilities of roads in that region that they will not build?

Mr. GAINES. What did the railroads want so much land for in your State?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, under the Union Pacific Railroad grant this Government gave alternate sections for 20 miles on each side of the road.

Mr. GAINES. Do you think that that was a good law?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It developed the country. I do not say but what it was an excessive grant; but when you talk about giving them terminal facilities of 60 acres of land at the termini and intersections of the roads, you are giving them practically nothing. These lands in that frozen region without a railroad are not worth 2 cents an acre. They must have at the starting point and at the end of the road terminal facilities, and 60 acres at those two points is a reasonable amount.

Mr. GAINES. Do you think it is the business of a railroad to go along and build up the country as such, or is it to build a road and let the railroad develop the country incidentally?

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is no question but what the building of a railroad develops the country.

Mr. GREENE. Under this provision is each company at a crossing of two roads to get 60 acres?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I presume so.

Mr. GREENE. That would make 120 acres at every railroad crossing?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; and how many crossings are they going to have? Probably there will not be a single crossing. These railroads will run up different river routes and can not very well cross each other.

Mr. GREENE. What do they want of the 120 acres?

Mr. SHAFROTH. They have got to have machine shops and other buildings, and 60 acres is not too much.

Mr. GREENE. Very well. Why not let them acquire the land by eminent domain or purchase?

Mr. SHAFROTH. When a railroad company attempts to build a line through a country of that kind, I do not think you ought to inflict hardships upon them. They are putting something into the region which is of inestimable advantage to the country. The enterprises are going to build and make an empire of it, and the idea of refusing to give them 60 acres of land is absurd in view of the fact that the legislation of this country heretofore has been to give them alternate sections for 20 miles on each side of the line. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the criticism is not just. If we do not want the roads to be built, we should grant them nothing.

Mr. GREENE. Do you not think the object of this is more to give the railroad a monopoly of the town sites than it is to give terminal facilities?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, no; it is not a monopoly of town sites.

Mr. GAINES. Does it not, as a matter of fact, do that, and, as a matter of fact, can they not keep other people out?

Mr. PITNEY. I should like to suggest that the RECORD shows that it was stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], in charge of the bill, that the 20 acres or 40 acres or 60 acres, or whatever the amount is to be, was given to enable them to get the control of the town; that that, in addition to the 200 feet right of way, would enable them to control the towns, and he said that was the only bonus that was given to the railroad company.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know whether that is true or not; but whether it is true or not, there is no question but what terminal facilities for a road that is going to amount to anything ought to embrace in the neighborhood of at least 60 acres of land. I know the terminal facilities of the Union Pacific road in my town cover 320 acres, and they have tracks, shops, and buildings scattered all over the same.

Mr. PITNEY. That is on a prairie?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; and I do not see why any less land should be given in a mountainous country than in a prairie country, for the land in a mountainous country is not as available for such purpose.

Mr. GAINES. There is no question but what a railroad ought——

Mr. SHAFROTH. My time is limited and I can not be interrupted any further concerning the matter now.

Mr. GAINES. I am not talking about the question of terminal facilities. I was not questioning that at all; but the giving to a railroad of 60 acres of land all along its line on either side, I say, is a wrong policy.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is not what is in this bill at all.

Mr. GAINES. Anywhere, I do not care where it is.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is not in this bill at all, or any other bill that I know of. The provisions of this bill simply give 60 acres of land at the termini and at the crossing of another road, not along the line at all. It simply gives them at the termini and intersections 60 acres of land upon which to build their shops. Elsewhere nothing is given but a hundred feet on each side for the right of way.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have two or three minutes more.

Mr. LACEY. There are only fourteen minutes left, and I want to yield some time to the gentleman from California [Mr. DE VRIES].

Mr. DE VRIES. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I called the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to the provision in this bill, H. R. 5975, which vests in the Secretary of the Interior the power of regulating railroad rates, both passenger and freight, in the District of Alaska. As a general rule, I think a provision of that character is vicious legislation, for the reason that it places the exercise of a judicial and legislative function within the power of an administrative officer. It goes without saying that the Secretary of the Interior is an administrative officer.

By the act of Congress of July, 1868, section 1954 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the laws of the United States relating to commerce, customs, and navigation were extended to the Territory of Alaska. Beyond doubt the effect of this provision of law is to extend the powers, duties, and functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission to that District. This necessarily carried with it jurisdiction in said commission for the regulation of railroad rates and traffic at that place by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That commission was organized for the purpose of performing legislative and judicial functions—legislative in so far as related to the regulation of rates to be charged in the future; judicial in so far as related to rates, and the regulation thereof, previously fixed.

Unfortunately in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission vs. Cincinnati, etc., Railway, 167 United States Supreme Court Report, the exercise of such legislative functions was denied the commission upon the ground that such were not contemplated by the provisions of the act constituting the commission. Undoubtedly the experiences and labors of such a body much better qualifies it for the performance of such duties than is the Secretary of the Interior qualified so to do, as he is already overburdened with dissimilar duties, not to mention the fact of the former ordinarily having the proper machinery for carrying out those duties. Such commission I suggest, therefore, would be the proper tribunal to which should be committed the regulation of railroad rates in Alaska, all things being equal. But there is one portion of this amendment which extends the power of that commission beyond where it is possessed by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States mentioned.

This provision gives to the Secretary of the Interior not only power to pass upon the rates which have been already fixed, and in terms makes the consent of the Secretary necessary to the establishment of any and all railroad rates in that Territory or District, but extends to the Secretary of the Interior the power to change these and to prescribe in advance the future rates which shall be charged by railroads in Alaska. This is a wise provision when the power is properly vested. I believe the Interstate Commerce Commission should be reorganized and vested with plenary powers both to adjudge existing and legislate the future rates of railroad traffic, not only in Alaska, but all over the United States. If I were preparing such a bill, and were to have my way about it, I should insist that those functions should be committed to a properly organized interstate-commerce commission, and that they should have not only power, as they have at present, to pass upon existing rates, but there should be added to that the power to fix in advance the rates to be charged in the future by all railroad companies in every part of the United States. Instead of attempting to authorize pooling by railroads, such should be denounced by statute and rates be fixed by the Government.

But inasmuch as that power does not at present exist with that commission, and inasmuch as it is well to place in some officer or tribunal the power to regulate those rates for the future, and inasmuch as the Secretary of the Interior has the machinery to be advised thereupon, and will be better advised of the affairs in Alaska than the Interstate Commerce Commission, after a thorough consideration I think it is the best provision that can be adopted for the present. If this provision is not accepted, I apprehend that no such provision can be obtained vesting this power in any official to which this is preferable, and therefore, for the present, satisfactory to me. It is to be sincerely and ardently hoped, however, that at an early day Congress will so reorganize the Interstate Commerce Commission and so invest it with these powers and jurisdiction that it will supersede this enactment and realize what was originally hoped it would accomplish.

In view of the fact that I called attention to the provision yesterday, I desired to make this statement in regard to the matter, for no provision of any bill so radical in effect and comprehensive in scope should pass this House without comment. This is one of the most important questions upon which Congress will be called upon to legislate in the future, for sooner or later it will be found necessary that all traffic rates of this kind shall be regulated by the Government.

As to the other provisions of the bill, I am convinced that they are the best that could be obtained under the circumstances, and are in the main just and wise.

Mr. LACEY. How much time is there remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Eleven minutes on either side.

Mr. PITNEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, this bill which was prepared and passed by the House and comes back with amendments which make it practically a new bill has raised a great many new questions.

Under these circumstances, as the matter of providing legislation for Alaska is really an important matter, the bill, with these amendments, instead of going before a conference committee, ought to be referred and recommitted to the main committee for actual and careful consideration. We do not know very much about the conditions of the Territory of Alaska; but I think it has been made plain from this debate that there are some lands that may well be subject to the homestead law, as for the raising of garden truck, but that there are other lands in which the application of the homestead law in a place given up to snow and ice would only give a monopoly of lands that are needed for transportation or other purposes. A careful bill ought to provide for proper surveys and that the Secretary of the Interior should declare what lands should be available under the homestead provision and what should not. Some guard of that sort is required. Now, what does this bill give to the railroads——

Mr. GAINES. You draw a distinction between the residential, agricultural, mechanical, and industrial lands. You think it ought to be divided?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. In some cases the lands are fit for one purpose and in other cases for another. The lands should be designated; otherwise there would be danger of the water supply, the canyons, being seized, and the landing places being seized. There should be some authority to say which land shall be subject to the homestead provision.

The railroad provisions also seem to me of importance. There are enormous mountains with occasional defiles, and rivers along the banks of which a railroad could be constructed. Speed is absolutely essential. In all mining countries this is required of every man who goes in and occupies, because it is for the benefit of the community. The title is always limited to what he takes, and whatever is done must be done promptly. Mining claims must be occupied and worked within a few days. A similar provision should exist with reference to railroads; and their rights should be acquired by real occupation.

But by this bill a railroad company is allowed to file a map or preliminary survey and within a year to file a final survey; and it is allowed a year after that to construct its first 20 miles and to acquire its right of way 200 feet wide, 100 feet on either side of the center line of the road, which in the passes of the mountains, as described, and on the banks of the rivers would deny access to any other railroad unless under such exceptions as are made in this bill, for the bill contains some exceptions.

In regard to the acquirement of a monopoly of the passes, the bill seems to me to need further safeguards. I can not think that the provisions of this nature as contained in the bill are exactly what they should be. I tried to get a copy of the bill this morning, and I found that the copies belonging to the House were exhausted. I will ask how many members have copies?

Mr. GAINES. I have been trying to get a copy and could not.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I got mine by sending to the Senate.

I submit that this bill should be reprinted, in order that it may be studied by members of the House, for it affects in important particulars a great domain. I believe also that the bill, with its amendments, should be recommitted to the proper committee for further hearing and consideration for at least a week; and when it returns to us it should be with a report making the measure entirely intelligible to members of the House. I therefore submit that we ought to disagree to the conference report. We ought to have a bill on this subject, and have it promptly. But it ought not to be a bill which allows a railroad company to tie matters up for a year by simply filing a location.

Mr. LACEY. How much territory would the railroad company have if located in Colorado or Nebraska?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have no knowledge as to that. I do not think that all our railroad laws in the West have been absolutely good; and if they are not, they ought to be improved. Here, at any rate, there is an absolute necessity to get across and through certain passes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PITNEY. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. PITNEY. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] two minutes.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I yesterday made a request of the gentleman from Iowa that this bill be allowed to go over and be printed, in order that the House might understand it. Some objections were made to the bill by certain persons whom I know; and they wanted an opportunity to present their objections in detail. They have not made to me such representations as would warrant me to-day in entering into any argument against the bill, because I am free to confess, Mr. Speaker, I do not sufficiently understand it.

But I do again want to call the attention of the House to a matter to which I called attention yesterday. It is that the House, in acting on this conference report, is about to pass legislation which nobody knows anything about. Yesterday in making this remark I excepted the conference committee; to-day I shall not except even them. I asked the chairman of the conference committee yesterday about this soldiers' additional homestead. He stated emphatically, as will be seen in the RECORD, that that was included in the first section of the bill as it came from the Senate. We find to-day that that never was in the bill as it came from the Senate; it has been injected into the bill by the conference committee.

I regard that as a very dangerous provision. People who went to Alaska thirty or forty years ago have acquired rights there. It is now proposed to give to these holders of soldiers' additional homestead scrip the right to go there and take away rights that have thus existed for years—to locate this scrip on behalf of speculators. I do not care anything about your 20 or 40 or 60 acres to railroad companies. I am not afraid of that phase of the case. If anybody wants to build a railroad in Alaska, I would be willing they should take 1,000 acres for every 10 miles of road, so far as that matter is concerned, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior.

But I call the attention of the House to the fact that there are many provisions in this bill which are not understood. This soldiers' additional homestead provision is a very vicious one; and it has been shown by the gentleman from New Jersey that there are other things in the bill which even the conference committee themselves did not understand to be there. I say it is impossible for a body to legislate intelligently upon a conference report presented in this way. I believe this matter should go back to the committee where it originated, so that upon a report hereafter it may be passed upon by the House in an intelligent manner.

I think the conference committee themselves, when they have carefully studied their report, should again submit the question to one or two intelligent persons, for they will find that no two people can come to the same conclusion regarding the meaning of the bill as it stands to-day.

Mr. PITNEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Mr. Speaker, is it in order now to move that the conference report be referred to the Committee on Public Lands for further report to the House, or must the report be first voted down?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that a conference report can not be referred—that it must be accepted or rejected.

Mr. PITNEY. If the report should be rejected, would it be then in order to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands before being again considered by the House or before notifying the Senate of our further insistence?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to hear some authority to justify such a course. He does not remember any such.

Mr. PITNEY. I have no authorities at hand.

Mr. Speaker, I will proceed to occupy about two minutes of my time in explanation of the reasons why it seems to me this grant of a right to the railroads beyond what is actually necessary for their needs may be a matter of considerable consequence. They are given 200 feet, as the gentleman understands, for the right of way, and they are not limited to a mere easement, which was originally provided in the bill. The conference committee have agreed that they shall have this right of way without limit, giving them absolute ownership. They are given also 20 acres for railroad purposes or stations in every 10 miles, and 60 acres for terminal stations or junctions. That is the point to which I have been specially referring. I see no reason why they should be allowed any such privilege as has been accorded to them in this report.

Now, it is true that these grants, while they carry the fee simple and an absolute title to the land, do not carry the right to the minerals which may be found in the land. But the act provides that all mining operations transacted within the limits of such right of way or other railroad lands shall, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, be conducted in a certain manner so as not to interfere with the railroad operations upon the surface. So the railroad companies would have it within their power to smother, at least to a certain extent, the right of miners to conduct mining operations on these lands.

And again, Mr. Speaker, while the conference report restricts the individual settler to a frontage of 80 rods upon a stream, whether navigable or otherwise—and these frontages are very valuable, both for mining and for fishing—the railroad companies can locate themselves directly—for there seems to be no restriction on that point—they can locate themselves directly on the streams, and would undoubtedly prefer to do so, because the location, as a rule, would be better for them; and they are therefore granted privileges which are not accorded to the ordinary settler, and can absolutely control the fisheries and the gold mining on the streams.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman state what right is given to these companies or corporations more than is given to individual settlers on the lands? Of course a right of way is granted to the roads, and that is necessary——

Mr. PITNEY. But that provision does not stand alone. There are other provisions which must be taken into consideration with it, and I have been endeavoring to call the attention of the House to some of these provisions.

Mr. MAHON. There must be clear and unequivocal words in the bill to carry the title in fee simple.

Mr. LACEY. I do not agree with the gentleman from New Jersey in regard to his construction of that portion of the bill to which he has just referred. There is no fee simple in it.

I now yield eight minutes of the time remaining to me to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy the time of the House only for a few moments in reference to the conference report now pending. When the committee of conference of the House came to meet the Senate conferees, it was found that there was a disposition to carry this legislation further than was originally contemplated when the bill was presented and considered by the House. Certain gentlemen upon the floor of the House, when this report was presented, have seen fit to criticise the measure, and it seems that it is not one that meets their approval in all respects, not being inspired, apparently, by a certain committee from which all "inspired measures" come, and therefore is open to criticism. One gentleman even desires to go so far as to send the measure back to the committee of conference for "intelligent consideration."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the committee in this report have endeavored to give the matter careful and intelligent consideration, and they believe they have done so. They have heard all who presented themselves for a hearing and have endeavored to present all of the facts in connection with the bill and regret exceedingly that the report does not meet the entire approval of all gentlemen. But we think, after a full consideration of the matter, that it will have the support of this body. We have possibly missed some points which gentlemen might have presented to us, and the gentleman from California has informed us that there was certain information received on yesterday that has not been embodied in the report of the committee, and that he was not consulted.

Mr. Speaker, we have not attempted, in the preparation of this bill, to guard any special interests. Our endeavor has been, from the very beginning, to make the law general and for the benefit of all persons interested in the Alaskan region. It is not a law intended to promote any particular private interests, in any sense of the word. On the contrary, it is designed as a general law, applicable alike to every citizen of the United States who may desire to take the advantage of its provisions.

The committee have been requested, from many sources and in many instances, to make provisions to protect private interests which it was believed by some ought to be protected. But we have invariably refused, and in all the provisions prepared by the committee we have endeavored to make a general law and applicable to the whole people. We have endeavored, therefore, to make this bill apply to all who had any rights whatever in Alaska.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are some gentlemen who seem to think that this 60-acre limit is a great stretch, and that the number of acres should be reduced. Why should it be reduced?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Especially when it is not worth 60 cents an acre.

Mr. PITNEY. But the point of my objection was, if the gentleman will allow me, that the conference committee exceeded its jurisdiction in some respects, especially with reference to this very point.

Mr. ELLIS. Well, I can only say, in response to the gentleman, that even supposing a larger allotment of land is allowed than that originally proposed, the time that has been devoted to the discussion of this bill in the House has cost the Government five times as much as the land is worth, even if it is given to the railroads, as far as that is concerned.

Now, there is not going to be any monopoly up in the Territory or District of Alaska. With over 500,000 square miles of territory the railroad builders are not going to rush in there and make it a network of roads and gobble up the valuable country to the detriment of the constituents of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD].

There is one interest in that country that vies with one of the great industries of the State of New Jersey with which we have not attempted to interfere, and that is the mosquito industry. We have not in any way trenched upon that or attempted to in this bill. [Laughter.]

Now, I think I can say, without egotism, Mr. Speaker, that those of us who live upon the Pacific coast and who come in daily contact with men who are familiar with Alaska and Alaskan conditions know probably almost as much about it as gentlemen who may belong to a committee, the touch of whose hand upon a bill amounts almost to inspiration. [Laughter.]

Mr. PITNEY. I think the gentleman ought to permit me to say, if he refers to me, that there has not been the slightest touch of inspiration of any kind——

Mr. LOUD. He referred to me.

Mr. PITNEY. That sort of thing is very cheap nonsense, and it has no applicability to the question under consideration.

Mr. ELLIS. Everything is cheap that does not emanate from a certain source, Mr. Speaker; but I want to say that we have endeavored in every possible way to hedge this bill about with every safeguard. We have consulted with men from Alaska. I have had numerous letters from constituents of mine who have gone into Alaska, in regard to this measure. We have listened to them and attempted to formulate a law that will tend to develop that country. It is in its infancy.

When you talk about railroads up there, it is all a matter of experiment. We do not know whether there is going to be any railroads built there or not. They may build a road to-day from tide water to the interior, and it may appear to be a great project, and there may appear to be millions in it, but by the simple failure of the mining industry in that country it would become practically worthless.

We have got to give the roads some little chance in order to get them into this country. We have not increased the right of way over what it is in Oregon, in Nebraska, or in every other public-land State.

In those States we have not suffered by reason of the right of way across the public domain, and the 200 feet limit has been in force there for years and years. It is not the desire of this committee in any way to hedge about or retard the development of the industries of Alaska. We want to enlarge them and to enable that country to become what it may become if the mining interests there prove to be what people hope they may be. If they fail, the country practically fails, and all railroads to the interior are of but little, if any, value. The stock would not bring 10 cents on the dollar unless the mining industries are developed and amount to something.

Now, the gentleman says that it will be thousands of miles from one terminal point to the other. We can reach from tide water to the Yukon River in less than 350 miles. If a railroad can be built across there, I take it that there will not be such an amount of business that there will be a great deal of railroad construction. One railroad will carry all the people and traffic that will want to go; the competition is not going to be great.

Some gentlemen object to the provision which gives to the Secretary of the Interior supervision over railroad rates. Your committee did not meet that with favor, but it was the best that we could do under the circumstances. Gentlemen have said, "Why not put it into the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission?" The Interstate Commerce Commission have practically no authority—of the little it was supposed to have it has been shorn by the decisions of the Supreme Court—and it has no power to do anything, so far as fixing rates is concerned.

The additional reason given for the proposed change is that the Secretary of the Interior has numerous men in that country now in various official capacities, and the duty could be delegated to them to look after that matter. It may become necessary to change the rates every few months. A railroad may be doing an immense business to-day on account of a mining rush, and to-morrow the business may play out entirely.

The rates that would be adequate to-day would be vastly inadequate on some other day. These things must all be taken into consideration. Gentlemen, everything is in chaos in Alaska now as far as the laws of the country are concerned. In one city, I believe, martial law has been declared. Others have practically no law, have no court before which they can take offenders to have their cases tried or differences adjudicated.

Now, it was our desire, so far as we could possibly do it, to try to provide for as many existing deficiencies as possible. It may be that we have wandered from the line the bill was originally intended to cover in order to meet existing needs, but if we have done so it has not been done with the desire to build up any monopoly or to enable the railroad companies to gobble 40 or 60 acres of that valuable land, but to enable the people of that country to proceed to the business of thoroughly developing the Territory.

We have sought in this bill to protect the shore line as far as possible, reserving to the Government every alternate 80 rods. Some gentlemen object to the homestead provision in this bill. Gentlemen, men are not going to flock into Alaska for the purpose of taking homes. Men would not want to take homes where they would, in many instances, have to take dynamite in order to blow off the ice to reach the ground. [Laughter.] There are countries nearer by vastly superior for such purposes. [Applause.]

Mr. PITNEY. May I ask the gentleman before he takes his seat——

Mr. LACEY. I want to call the attention of my friend from New Jersey to a difference in respect to railroads between New Jersey and Alaska, which has been suggested to me by my friend and colleague on the committee. Under the act of 1878 a grant of 200 feet is given over any public lands of the United States for railroad purposes. You can build through the State of Oregon, through the State of Washington, Colorado, or Nebraska, over the public lands there, with a 200-foot right of way, in the language used there: "A right of way through the public lands is hereby granted."

The House bill provides in this case that "a right of way is hereby granted;" but the Senate inserted "easement for" the right of way. They struck out "through," and it is a little difference like that, of an easement for an easement, that is troubling the gentleman—two negatives which destroy each other. And it is that which my friend from New Jersey criticises more than anything else.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman misstates my position.

Mr. LACEY. I have only two minutes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have had the benefit in the conference of an ex-Commissioner of the Land Office, a man who has all of these laws at his fingers' ends; we have had the benefit of my friend from Oregon [Mr. ELLIS], who lives in a great public-land State; we have had the benefit of my friend from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who lives in a great mining and public-land State. The miners' rights have been preserved here, and really the only legislation that can be criticised at all is the provision of reciprocity between Canada on the one side and Alaska on the other. It has been objected that it is not proper to put this in, but if it is an infraction of the rules of the House, the provision itself has not been criticised except by the gentlemen from the great mining State of New Jersey. Gentlemen who live in the mining regions are in favor of it.

Mr. PITNEY. That State is more interested in mining than many others.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; they are making gold out of sea water! [Laughter.] That has got to be a great mining State! [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have spent two solid months in this matter, have had a full conference, and have waited until the governor of Alaska has come, and have waited until Sloss shall come, and when he comes I do not knew whether the end of the world will tip up or not [laughter] and decide the matter.

But he has not been able to point out to my friend from California any objection at all to this bill, and that gentleman, after sleeping upon it—my friend from California—has been frank enough to come in this morning and say that after giving it a thorough examination, sleeping over it, and praying over it, perhaps, overnight, that he has not been able to find any further objection to it this morning, and my friend on the Committee on Appropriations seems to have worlds enough without seeking others to conquer to come in and take their place. I ask for the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The time has expired.

The question was taken on the adoption of the report; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PITNEY. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes none.

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to was laid on the table.

CARRIERS ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to further ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4372.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will read.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4372) concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees.

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers and their officers, agents, and employees, except masters of vessels and seamen, as defined in section 4612, Revised Statutes of the United States, engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, for a continuous carriage or shipment, from one State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States.

The term "railroad" as used in this act shall include all bridges and ferries use or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under a contract, agreement, or lease; and the term "transportation" shall include all instrumentalities of shipment or carriage.

The term "employees" as used in this act shall include all persons actually engaged in any capacity in train operation or train service of any description, and notwithstanding that the cars upon or in which they are employed may be held and operated by the carrier under lease or other contract: Provided, however, That this act shall apply only to employees engaged in railroad train service, and shall not be held to apply to employees of street railroads. In every such case the carrier shall be responsible for the acts and defaults of such employees in the same manner and to the same extent as if said cars were owned by it and said employees directly employed by it, and any provisions to the contrary of any such lease or other contract shall be binding only as between the parties thereto and shall not affect the obligations of said carrier either to the public or to the private parties concerned.

The wages paid by carriers subject to this act for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation aforesaid, or in connection therewith, or for the receiving, delivering, storage, and handling of such property, and the rules and regulations governing such employees, shall be reasonable and just. This provision shall not affect the right to make contracts for such wages not in contravention of any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That whenever a controversy concerning wages, hours of labor, or conditions of employment shall arise between a carrier subject to this act and the employees of such carrier, seriously interrupting or threatening to interrupt the business of said carrier, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Commissioner of Labor shall, upon the request of either party to the controversy, with all practical expedition, put themselves in communication with the parties to such controversy, and shall use their best efforts, by mediation and conciliation, to amicably settle the same; and if such efforts shall be unsuccessful, shall at once endeavor to bring about an arbitration of said controversy in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That whenever a controversy shall arise between a carrier subject to this act and the employees of such carrier which can not be settled by mediation and conciliation in the manner provided in the preceding section, said controversy may be submitted to the arbitration of a board of three persons, who shall be chosen in the manner following: One shall be named by the carrier or employer directly interested; the other shall be named by the labor organization to which the employees directly interested belong, or, if they belong to more than one, by that one of them which specially represents employees of the same grade and class and engaged in services of the same nature as said employees so directly interested: Provided, however, That when a controversy involves and affects the interests of two or more classes and grades of employees belonging to different labor organizations, such arbitrator shall be agreed upon and designated by the concurrent action of all such labor organizations. The two thus chosen shall select the third commissioner of arbitration; but, in the event of their failure to name such arbitrator within forty-eight hours after their first meeting, the third arbitrator shall be named by the commissioners named in the preceding section. The submission shall be in writing, shall be signed by the employer and by the labor organization representing the employees, shall state the questions to be decided, and shall contain appropriate provisions by which the respective parties shall stipulate, as follows:

First. That pending the arbitration the status existing immediately prior to the dispute shall not be changed.

Second. That the award shall be filed in the clerk's office of the circuit court of the United States for any district wherein the employer carries on business, and shall be final and conclusive upon both parties, unless set aside for error of law apparent on the record.

Third. That the respective parties to the award will each faithfully execute the same, and that the same may be specifically enforced in equity so far as the powers of a court of equity permit, except that no person shall be punished for his failure to comply with the award as for contempt of court.

Fourth. That employees dissatisfied with the award shall not by reason of such dissatisfaction quit the service of the employer before the expiration of three months from and after the making of such award without giving thirty days' notice in writing of their intention so to quit. Nor shall the employer dissatisfied with such award dismiss any employee or employees on account of such dissatisfaction before the expiration of three months from and after the making of such award without giving thirty days' notice in writing of his intention so to discharge.

Fifth. That said award shall continue in force as between the parties thereto for the period of one year after the same shall go into practical operation, and no new arbitration upon the same subject between the same employer and the same class of employees shall be had until the expiration of said one year if the award is not set aside as provided in section 4.

SEC. 4. That the award being filed in the clerk's office of a circuit court of the United States, as hereinbefore provided, shall go into practical operation, and judgment shall be entered thereon accordingly at the expiration of ten days from such filing, unless within such ten days either party shall file exceptions thereto for matter of law apparent upon the record, in which case said award shall go into practical operation and judgment be entered accordingly when such exceptions shall have been finally disposed of either by said circuit court or on appeal therefrom.

At the expiration of ten days from the decision of the circuit court upon exceptions taken to said award, as aforesaid, judgment shall be entered in accordance with said decision unless during said ten days either party shall appeal therefrom to the circuit court of appeals. In such case only such portion of the record shall be transmitted to the appellate court as is necessary to the proper understanding and consideration of the questions of law presented by said exceptions and to be decided.

The determination of said circuit court of appeals upon said questions shall be final, and being certified by the clerk thereof to said circuit court, judgment pursuant thereto shall thereupon be entered by said circuit court.

If exceptions to an award are finally sustained, judgment shall be entered setting aside the award. But in such case the parties may agree upon a judgment to be entered disposing of the subject-matter of the controversy, which judgment when entered shall have the same force and effect as judgment entered upon an award.

SEC. 5. That for the purposes of this act the arbitrators herein provided for, or either of them, shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations, sign subpœnas, require the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of all books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation; and may invoke the aid of the United States courts to compel witnesses to attend and testify to the same extent and under the same conditions and penalties as is provided for in the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and the amendments thereto.

SEC. 6. That every agreement of arbitration under this act shall be acknowledged by the parties before a notary public or clerk of a district or circuit court of the United States, and when so acknowledged shall be delivered to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who shall at once cause a notice in writing to be served upon the arbitrators fixing a time and place for a meeting of the arbitrators.

If an agreement of arbitration shall be entered into conforming to this act, except that it shall be executed by employees individually instead of by a labor organization as their representative, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Commissioner of Labor shall decline to call a meeting of arbitrators thereunder unless, upon evidence satisfactory to them, it be shown that the employees signing the submission represent or include a majority of all employees in the service of the same employer and of the same grade and class, and that an award pursuant to said submission can justly be regarded as binding upon all such employees.

SEC. 7. That during the pendency of arbitration under this act it shall not be lawful for the employer, party to such arbitration, to discharge the employees, parties thereto, except for inefficiency, violation of law, or neglect of duty; nor for the organization representing such employees to order, nor for the employees to unite in, aid, or abet strikes or boycotts against said employer; nor, during a period of three months after an award under such an arbitration for such employer to discharge any such employees, except for the causes aforesaid, without giving thirty days' written notice of an intent so to discharge; nor for any of such employees, during a like period, to quit the service of said employer without just cause, without giving to said employer thirty days' written notice of an intent so to do; nor for such organization representing such employees to order, counsel, or advise otherwise. Any violation of this section shall subject the offending party to liability for damages.

SEC. 8. That in every incorporation under the provisions of chapter 567 of the United States statutes of 1885 and 1886 it must be provided in the articles of incorporation and in the constitution, rules, and by-laws that a member shall cease to be such by participating in or by instigating force or violence against persons or property during strikes, lockouts, or boycotts, or by seeking to prevent others from working through violence, threats, or intimidations; but members of such incorporations shall not be personally liable for the acts, debts, or obligations of the corporations, nor shall such corporations be liable for the acts of members or others in violation of law; and such corporations may appear by designated representatives before the board created by this act, or in any suits or proceedings for or against such corporations or their members in any of the Federal courts.

SEC. 9. That whenever receivers appointed by Federal courts are in the possession and control of railroads, the employees upon such railroads shall have the right to be heard in such courts upon all questions affecting the terms and conditions of their employment, through the officers and representatives of their associations, whether incorporated or unincorporated, and no reduction of wages shall be made by such receivers without the authority of the court therefor after due notice to such employees.

SEC. 10. That any employer subject to the provisions of this act and any officer, agent, or receiver of such employer who shall require any employee, or any person seeking employment, as a condition of such employment, to enter into an agreement, either written or verbal, not to become or remain a member of any labor corporation, association, or organization; or shall threaten any employee with loss of employment, or shall unjustly discriminate against any employee because of his membership in such a labor corporation, association, or organization; or who shall require any employee or any person seeking employment, as a condition of such employment, to enter into a contract whereby such employee or applicant for employment shall agree to contribute to any fund for charitable, social, or beneficial purposes; to release such employer from legal liability for any personal injury by reason of any benefit received from such fund beyond the proportion of the benefit arising from the employer's contribution to such fund; or who shall, after having discharged an employee, attempt or conspire to prevent such employee from obtaining other employment, is hereby declared to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in the district in which such offense was committed, shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000.

SEC. 11. That a sufficient sum of money to pay the traveling and other necessary and proper expenses of the arbitrators appointed and serving under this act, and to pay all other necessary and proper expenses of any conciliation or arbitration had hereunder, to be audited and allowed by the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, is hereby appropriated, for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1898, and June 30, 1899, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 12. That the act to create boards of arbitration or commission for settling controversies and differences between railroad corporations and other common carriers engaged in interstate or territorial transportation of property or persons and their employees, approved October 1, 1888, is hereby repealed.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

On page 4, lines 27 and 28, strike out all after the word "First," and insert—

"That the board of arbitration shall commence their hearings within five days from the date of the appointment of the third arbitrator, and shall find and file their award, as provided in this section, within twenty days from the date of the appointment of the third arbitrator; and that, pending the arbitration, the status existing immediately prior to the dispute shall not be changed."

On page 5, line 37, after the word "permit," strike out the words "except that," and in the same line, after the word "shall," insert the word "however."

On page 9, line 10, strike out the word "but," and insert a period (.).

On page 10, line 20, strike out the word "other," and after the word "employment" insert "or who shall, after the quitting of an employee, attempt or conspire to prevent such employee from obtaining employment."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this bill has been approved by the labor organizations of the country?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hold in my hand a statement signed by the leading order of railway conductors, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I can not hear one word that the gentleman says.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understood the gentleman from Kansas to ask if the labor organizations approved this bill. I suppose the gentleman means the labor organizations directly affected.

Mr. SIMPSON. Well, I presume that all labor organizations are interested.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have had no intimation from any labor organization that this bill was objectionable, but, on the contrary, I know that a bill substantially in the line of the same provisions has met the approval of all the labor organizations of the United States.

Mr. SIMPSON. Has it met with the approval of the Federation of Labor?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not find anything specially relating to this particular bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. The laboring men are all in favor of it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This bill applies simply to controversies between employers and employees on railroads. I will state, however, that prominent members of other labor organizations were present in the committee on the different occasions when I was present and when the merits of the bill were discussed. That is all I can say.

A MEMBER. How do the railroads stand in regard to it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have had no consultation with any railway men on the subject, one way or the other.

Mr. SULZER. Is this the industrial-exposition bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is not. It is an arbitration bill and is properly described in its title, "A bill concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees." It relates to arbitration between railroads and the men employed by them.

Mr. SAYERS. Is not this the same bill which has already passed the House twice?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; it has twice passed the House.

Mr. SAYERS. And passed the Senate once?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It was passed by the Senate, but failed to reach the President in time for his signature.

Mr. SAYERS. And I understand the gentleman to say that this bill is the result of an agreement between all parties directly interested in the measure?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is so. It is one of a series of arbitration bills which we hope to have passed covering all forms of labor in the United States.

Mr. BELKNAP. As I understand the situation, the railway engineers, firemen, conductors, and telegraph operators' organizations approve the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is approved by the railway conductors, by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, by the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, and by the Order of Railway Telegraphers.

Mr. SIMPSON. If I understand the provisions of the bill, it applies to the Federation of Labor, to the Knights of Labor, and to all labor organizations.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It applies to nobody save those employed by railroads. It is, as I have said, one of a series of measures of this kind.

Mr. GREENE. Is there anything in this bill that can be made effective except by mutual agreement of the parties——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Nothing whatever.

Mr. GREENE (continuing). Except the fact that in case of arbitration the employees are prohibited from quitting the service of the company without giving thirty days' notice?

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the employer is forbidden to discharge the employee without like notice.

Mr. GREENE. But I am asking whether that is the only thing that can be enforced in the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is all.

Mr. GREENE. So that the only effect of the bill would be to prevent men from quitting work if they wanted to and to prevent the employer from discharging them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The bill does not prevent men from quitting work when they want to; but if they do so, they are no longer parties to the arbitration unless they give thirty days' notice.

Mr. GREENE. Is there a penalty if they do so?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think there is none; nothing in this bill certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. There is a provision that there shall be a remedy in equity; but that is followed by a further provision that nobody shall be punished as for contempt of court.

Mr. GREENE. So that if there is any part of the bill that can have any force or effect at all it is simply that part which prevents the employee from quitting the service of the employer without giving thirty days' notice and the employer from discharging the employee without like notice. If there is anything in the bill to be enforced, that is all, is it not?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is all; and we provide that——

Mr. GREENE. Can not the consideration of this bill go over until we can have an opportunity to look into it further? Some of us would like to examine it before it is acted on finally.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The delay which the gentleman asks would probably defeat the measure for the present Congress. It has already been twice passed by the House. It has passed the scrutiny of the labor interests; and it seems to me it ought now to pass. Our only hope of getting it through the Senate is by passing it now. Surely the gentleman will accept the judgment of all the parties who are interested. The Committee on Labor are unanimously in favor of the measure; there is no opposition to it from anybody interested. It is a great step in the direction of settling these labor disputes by arbitration. Surely the gentleman ought to let the bill go through now. We do not often have an opportunity to act upon these bills.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel inclined to object, but still I would like to ask the gentleman to state the provisions of the bill as it is now presented for consideration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will state to the gentleman from Nebraska that this bill contains in it the wisdom combined of all the labor organizations from all parts of the United States. They have been heard before the committee, and have presented this bill as a measure which meets the unanimous approval of all of these bodies.

This is the third Congress in which this proposition has been made, and I repeat that this bill embodies the combined wisdom of all of the labor organizations which have worked on the subject. It has been prepared by the Committee on Labor of this House after thorough and careful consideration of all of the matters presented to them.

The bill has the unanimous approval of the committee, and there are one or two suggestions of amendments to which I will call the attention of the House in due time when the bill is up for consideration. These amendments have been also considered carefully by the committee; they meet the approval of the labor bodies, and will be of service to the cause of labor throughout the country. I hope, therefore, the friends of labor on the floor will not interfere with the passage of the bill.

Mr. GREENE. The gentleman from Ohio speaks of the interest of the labor organizations of the country in this bill. Does he mean to include in that the men who do the ordinary work of laborers throughout the country?

Mr. MCEWAN. Yes; it includes all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Every man, even the man who does the scraping, the oiling, and performs the minor labors around the railroad yards—all are included.

Mr. MCEWAN. Every form of labor is embraced, and, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say, if the gentleman will permit me, that there is probably no bill which can ever come before this House that has been more carefully considered and more thoroughly protected, as far as the labor interests of our people are concerned, than this very bill. It was originally drawn and submitted to Attorney-General Olney, and it had the very shrewdest, sharpest, and best consideration he could give to it——

Mr. GREENE. Well, that is a circumstance rather against the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Well, he is a man of very great ability, as the gentleman will concede. The measure was thoroughly considered and carefully prepared by him, and it was also submitted to the railroad companies, and was considered by the Labor Bureau, under the care of Carroll D. Wright; and every railroad organization and every labor organization in the country has approved of the bill and recommended its passage. This will be the very first time, if the bill is enacted into a law, when the laboring men of the country are put on an equality with their employers.

Mr. GREENE. But, Mr. Speaker, the point is, and I desire to ask the gentleman, why he should undertake to pass a bill here that admittedly can not be enforced? What value is there in it?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. But it can be enforced.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me, if we desire to pass an arbitration bill, now is the opportunity. This effort has been made time and again. The bill is now presented by the unanimous report of the committee——

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Are there not amendments which have been suggested to this bill and which the gentleman has already referred to?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is correct.

Mr. CUMMINGS. At whose request were they put in?

Mr. VANDIVER. Let me understand the gentleman from Ohio. As I understood him, he said it would be impossible to pass a bill to compel the labor organizations to submit to arbitration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. VANDIVER. This is a proposition to put into the bill a plan by which the railroad companies can be forced to agree to arbitration with their employees. Now, is there any objection to such a proposition as that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not heard of any. It is intended to attempt to bring about arbitration by the consent of all parties in interest.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. If that be the purpose, then in what respect does this bill strengthen their ability now to come to arbitration?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It provides machinery for the arbitration, without which there is no such thing as arbitration.

Mr. SULLIVAN. That exists in every State, does it not?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That may be; but this is interstate.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Will the gentleman state why the committee have refrained from introducing any bill which would compel the railroad companies to submit to arbitration?

Mr. GROSVENOR. You can not compel that. You can not compel a laborer on a railroad to arbitrate his claim, can you? If I am handling a pick on a railroad and I dispute with my employer, can you force me to arbitrate? That is the very keynote of the opposition of labor to all these compulsory arbitration bills.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether this bill attempts to deal with railroads the termini of which are within the boundaries of a State?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman can see what the bill attempts to do.

Mr. KING. I have not had an opportunity to read the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It certainly does not attempt to do that. That could not be done.

Mr. KING. I agree with the gentleman that it could not be done. I did not know whether any such attempt had been made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The object of referring this bill to Mr. Olney, when he was Attorney-General, was to get from him, he being a very high law authority, an opinion whether or not, under our constitutional restriction and limitation, this bill was legal. That was all. We did not ask him for an opinion whether it was wise to pass it, but simply whether it was legal under our constitutional limitations.

Mr. GREENE. The bill then simply in effect amounts to a recommendation from Congress that they arbitrate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; it amounts to a good deal more than that; and if that be so, it comes here with the recommendation of every man interested in it.

Mr. GREENE. It is really only a recommendation. That is the only effect it can have.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I want to suggest to my friend from Ohio that, so far as I remember, this is the only bill that has ever been brought into the House which recognizes trades unions.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The first one. It recognizes organized labor and puts them in a position to assert their rights in behalf of their members.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to say to the gentleman upon my left that I have received letters from members of the organizations in my district affected by this measure, and they have all asked me to give an arbitration bill my support, and they feel——

Mr. GREENE. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I am not going to object at all.

Mr. SAYERS. Just a moment. They feel that under the operations of such a measure some good, at least, can come out of it, and that it will afford a method by which controversies and differences can be settled in a peaceful and proper way. I am not familiar with the bill under consideration, but with the assurance by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that it has the entire approval and indorsement of the employees affected by it, I feel it my duty to give it my support.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And if the bill is not perfect as we pass it, we shall very soon know it, and the temper of Congress will be to amend it.

Mr. GREENE. I had no intention whatever of objecting. I simply wanted to get some information as to what the bill is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I think we can now inquire whether there is any objection to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will only occupy a moment of time, for I think the House understands the bill perfectly. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] desires to offer an amendment. I wish he would now suggest it, so that we can consider it.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me——

Mr. GROSVENOR. One moment; one at a time.

Mr. DOCKERY. On page 11, in lines 19 and 20, I move to strike out the words:

To be audited and allowed by the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

And insert the following:

To be approved by the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think that is a proper amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. That ought to be made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think that is a proper amendment, and if there is no objection that amendment may be considered now as adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, in lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "to be audited and allowed by the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission" and insert the words "to be approved by the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury."

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. DOCKERY was agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS] desires to be heard.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I desire to bring your attention to a few features of this bill that do not meet my approval, and I ask the gentleman from Ohio if he will be kind enough to let me know his views, so that I may see if I may be prejudiced rather than convinced?

I introduced a similar bill in the House, a bill for arbitration, the bill H. R. 9805, in which I sought to effect some of the features of the gentleman's measure. First, why does the gentleman in his measure limit the right of these men to the United States courts? Second——

Mr. GROSVENOR. For the simple reason that a State court has no jurisdiction in interstate commerce, and the courts can not try it. The gentleman himself is a lawyer, and he surely knows that.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I appreciate the reference the gentleman makes to me, but we must differ. I did not intend to get into a debate on the bill, and therefore will exclude all considerations of any right along these limitations of any State.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The States can make such further provisions as they see fit. I am a State rights man. Fundamentally I am a Democrat on some questions. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. The gentleman to that extent has redeemed many of his political vices. But I wish to ask my distinguished friend whether it was his intention to apply to railroads which have their beginning and termini within any one State?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not. I want to correct the gentleman about another matter. When he speaks of my intention, I want to disclaim the entire or even a good large part of the authorship of this bill. This bill was the work of the organizations interested in it before my name appeared on it at all.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I wish to say to the gentleman that I understand something about the history of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me say, further, to the gentleman that if the bill is passed by Congress and operates well upon interstate commerce we have confidence in believing that the different States in the Union will adopt it in the form of State legislation if it affords the remedies that are sought.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Without consuming the gentleman's time, and it is so unsatisfactory to secure what I desire by interrogatories, I would ask the gentleman if he would not give me a few minutes' time in which I may endeavor to point out the character of my objections to the bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. My proposition is to pass the bill.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Then I desire to know if any arrangement can be made by which I can have some time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I would like fifteen minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Can not you get along with ten minutes? Make an honest effort to get through in ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington requests fifteen minutes.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I do not want the time now. I do not want to take precedence of my friend. I wanted to hear the distinguished gentleman give an explanation of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I demand the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to know if this bill provides for arbitration between the Government and its employees?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Well, it ought to do so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think so, too.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And I will tell you why. In the Brooklyn Navy-Yard, under the naval regulations, there is a board of labor, composed of officers of the Navy; and these officers have repeatedly discharged men for being members of the Machinists' Union, and these machinists have come to Congress repeatedly for relief and never received it. It seems to me that this is a place where it ought to be applied.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say to the gentleman from New York, let us do one thing at a time. We can not do everything at once, and I will join with the gentleman in securing the remedy in the matter of which he speaks.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will vote for your bill. It ought to go through.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I have offered the gentleman from Washington fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, at the outset I observed an air of indifferent playfulness on the part of my Republican friends when this measure was called up, which demonstrates to me their incapacity to see that this is an actually serious matter, and they now laugh at this assertion, while the gentleman in charge of the bill assures them that as it can not be executed they can vote freely. I am not asking time as a favor or courtesy, and I do not wish gentlemen to feel that they are granting any favor in affording me this time, but that I am seeking recognition in my own right. I have some conscientious objections to this measure, and seek to discharge my constitutional duty by expressing them.

My interest in this bill is not antagonistic to it, but rather lies in the line of perfecting it. I do not blush to say to you gentlemen that I am in somewhat personal association with this question. I have been a friend of these labor organizations in the best years of my manhood life. I am to-day a member of one of their organizations, carrying one of their cards in my pocket. I had to toil with them for my subsistence in my earlier endurances in the city in which I now live, and from that time on I have borne such association with them as fits me to make one or two suggestions as voicing their views.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio that it is almost impracticable to pass an arbitration law that can be executed between the parties should they themselves be averse to its provisions. On page 5, in paragraph 2, section 3, of this bill I find it provided that—

> The award shall be filed in the clerk's office of the circuit court of the United States for any district wherein the employer carries on business, and shall be final and conclusive upon both parties unless set aside for error of law apparent on the record.

I do not give my approval to the idea that these men should be limited in remedying their grievances to the Federal courts. I do not accede to the proposition of my friend from Ohio that the Federal courts alone would have jurisdiction. I hold that a State court would have as complete jurisdiction to enforce the rights of these people as would a Federal court, unless one of the parties, upon the ground of diverse citizenship, claims exemption from the State jurisdiction.

I shall, therefore, at the proper time move to amend by inserting after the words "circuit court of the United States" the words "or any State court having jurisdiction of the persons or subject-matter." Our experience with the giving of exclusive jurisdiction to the Federal courts demonstrates the necessity of avoiding them, far less increasing and extending their jurisdiction over the workman. He should have the privilege to go into the nearest and cheapest court legally accessible for the enforcement of his rights, the redressing of his wrongs. Also he ought to be permitted recourse to those courts which are established by his votes and owe something to the public, and not be forced to try his humble fortunes in these arbitrary tribunals which are ever above the people and ever defy the Government.

In the second place, I object to the provision in paragraph 3, section 3, which reads:

> That the respective parties to the award will each faithfully execute the same, and that the same may be specially enforced in equity so far as the powers of a court of equity permit.

I object to this with special emphasis. The House of Lords of England on the 16th of last December decided, in a case which had reached that body after seven appeals, that such an inherent power in a court of equity was neither wise nor legitimate, and that they would not attempt to execute it, because it did not provide the manner of the execution, nor what form the relief was to take; that such a statute did not define its own jurisdiction. I submit that such a provision would be productive of much injury and no good.

Suppose these parties are tempted to apply to a court of equity, "which court shall proceed to execute its powers." There is but one way in which a court of equity can do so. There can be no enforcement in equity of the specific performance affirmatively of a contract of personal service between individuals. How, then, would it be enforced? By an injunctive process—by issuing an injunction against an individual who refuses to comply with the mandate of the court; prohibiting any refusal to comply with the award; enjoining the disobedience of it; decreeing the employee guilty of violating the injunction if he does so refuse to comply with the award; fine him for contempt by forfeiting his pay, or putting him under bonds he can not give, or, lastly, as has been the custom of these courts, to jail the man as a felon and keep him there until he consents to an unfair and prejudiced award, or imprison him indefinitely for contempt for violating the injunction.

Therefore that provision has clearly for its purpose the vesting in the United States court of the right of injunction in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction and the enforcement of the decree by enjoining one of the parties from disobeying it. While, as my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania has remarked, the law does not punish the violation of the award as a contempt of court, it does by its silence authorize punishment of the violation of the injunction as a contempt of court.

Under that section a man may be enjoined from violating the arbitration, and if he violates that injunction he may be punished for contempt of court—not because he violates the award (for the provision of the bill exempts him from that), but because he violates the injunction of a Federal equity court executing the award. This section permits, I fear, the exercise of the punitive power of the court in this case to such an extent as to involve the repetition of disasters which the history of the last three or four years has brought too forcibly to our knowledge. For this reason that part of the section under consideration is, to my mind, bad, very bad, as it allows the exercise of a jurisdiction which, as experience has proved, should be limited, not enlarged.

Again, in the same section (line 14, paragraph 3, page 5) it is provided that—

> No person shall, however, be punished for his failure to comply with the award as for a contempt of court.

But there is nothing there providing that he shall not be punished. The provision is merely that he shall not be punished as for a contempt. In every other conceivable way the Federal courts may punish him—for instance, by forcing him to forfeit his wages. If the party fails to comply with the award, although he may not be punished as for a contempt, he is still subject to the power of the court and may be made the victim of the exercise of more methods of punishment than the limit of this debate will allow or present imagination conceive.

This provision is so indefinite and general in its terms, and is to my mind so likely to be productive of persecution, that I can not support it. This is one of the provisions insinuated into this bill, as a serpent may be coiled within forest leaves. It only awaits stillness or opportunity to strike the unsuspecting. It is a provision suggested by such employers as have given this bill their "unqualified support." One is the M. A. Hanna & Co. Coal Company, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and, lately, the Carnegie Iron and Steel Works.

It may be true, as some gentlemen state, that the principle of this measure has the indorsement of certain reputable labor organizations; but these men are unaccustomed to the criminal sinuosities of the law and the sneaking methods and corrupt purposes of legislative "workers." Had they understood the extent of these provisions they never would have countenanced them. Never! They have been beguiled and now deceived!

I shall therefore offer an amendment to obviate these serious objections to the section by striking out, after the words "be punished for his failure to comply," the words "with the award as for contempt of court," leaving it so as to prevent any kind of punishment, thus denying to the Federal court the right to punish the party in any form or manner. Without this amendment the act would not, upon the concession of its friends, be reciprocal, but admittedly one-sided and against the laborer.

I call attention next to the fourth clause on the same page:

That employees dissatisfied with the award shall not by reason of such dissatisfaction quit the service of the employer before the expiration of three months from and after the making of such award without giving thirty days' notice in writing of their intention so to quit.

This provision impresses me as fraught with many evils. One is this: Who is to decide as to the cause of the employee quitting the service of his employer? Shall it be the employer or the employee or the court? The employee may quit and give some other reason than dissatisfaction with the award; but the court, in the exercise of its "equitable" power, may say that the real reason was dissatisfaction with the award and may force the man to remain in his employment, while in the meantime the employer might visit hardship upon the employee unnamable. But why force him to give thirty days' notice to quit a matter which hourly may be impoverishing or persecuting him? He, if one of the employees under a late order of Judge Jenkins, would for that thirty days get no pay and be refused the opportunity to toil for anyone who might pay him.

But, Mr. Speaker, the latter part of the section accentuates my real objection to the whole proposition, and which is in the following words:

Nor shall the employer dissatisfied with such award dismiss any employee or employees on account of such dissatisfaction before the expiration of three months from and after the making of such award without giving thirty days' notice, in writing, of his intention so to discharge.

The effect of that provision will be that if the employer is dissatisfied with the employee, or desires to dismiss him, he can simply refuse to give any reason for his discharge; or he could refuse to give the true reason, and possibly would give any other than the true reason. He will therefore dismiss the man on some other ground, or by the statement of some other reason, and then let him go. What recourse has the employee? None. I think the proposition is entirely wrong in that respect. With regard to that, I shall offer an amendment to correct it.

Again, on the next page a provision is made with reference to the discharge of employees, which should be amended. It permits the employer to discharge without giving reason, and at once provides no penalty for such wrongful dismissal, yet forces the laborer to give thirty days' notice. The employer should be liable to damages for unjust dismissal simply because he may be dissatisfied with the award. This would make the position of the employer and the employee the same, so that there shall be proper reciprocal relations between them. The employer, under this provision of the bill, can dismiss the employee, and the employee has no redress. If the employee is to be punished, some provision should be made in the bill by way of amendment whereby the employer would be subject to equal burdens.

And the next, Mr. Speaker, and the last clause which the time allowed permits me to call to the attention of the House, is found on page 7, beginning with line 20:

At the expiration of ten days from the decision of the circuit court upon exceptions taken to said award, as aforesaid, judgment shall be entered in accordance with said decision unless during said ten days either party shall appeal therefrom to the circuit court of appeals. In such case only such portion of the record shall be transmitted to the appellate court as is necessary to the proper understanding and consideration of the questions of law presented by said exceptions and to be decided.

Now, the period allowed here, as all lawyers present will recognize, is a very brief one. Under ordinary circumstances an appeal can be made under the general law in six months. The time allowed—ten days—is absolutely too short. Take, for instance, my own district as an illustration. Suppose the matter is in issue at Seattle and the circuit court is held at San Francisco. When an appeal is to be made at Seattle or San Francisco, under this provision of the law, he would be allowed only ten days. Under ordinary circumstances such appeals could be made within six months. The limitation is entirely unfair to the litigants in action.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Washington is a lawyer, and of course he understands the difference between making an appeal and perfecting an appeal. It is mutual upon the parties——

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I regret that my friend from Ohio has indicated some feeling of violence in reference to this matter. I am not making any special opposition to the bill, but simply pointing out what I regard as a few defects in the bill that ought to be remedied.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I have no feeling, but am only expressing the most intense disgust.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. The gentleman from Ohio says it is his disgust. Sir, it is the usual disgust displayed by the gentleman every time any member in this House refuses to recognize his unimpeachable virtues or the infallibility of his judgment. [Laughter and applause.]

I regret, Mr. Speaker, exceedingly, that the gentleman from Ohio is so affected with nausea on the present occasion and that he has developed it in such a distasteful manner to the House. I have not been undertaking to do more than to point out defects in his measure. He is now conscious of them and declines to have them made public.

It has come to me from a number of labor organizations in my region of country that certain features of the pending bill are oppressive.

I have been endeavoring, in my feeble way, to explain what some of those objections were, and to suggest others of my own observation, and this without loss of temper or dignity; and I regret very much that any gentleman, especially the gentleman from Ohio, should characterize these proffered amendments as nauseating. He seems intentionally to ignore a member's right to criticise any bill brought in here, even by him——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me there to make an explanation?

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Not if the gentleman wishes to continue to gratuitously insult me under the guise of an explanation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has been reading the terms of stipulations third, fourth, and fifth, and calls them part of the mandatory part of the statute, when they are simply the terms which the laborer and the railroad company may put into the submission, and have no effect whatever in the direction the gentleman has been talking about.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. If my friend be right, that part of it is his explanation and justification, or an answer to my position. It is not a reason why I should not give my construction to these matters. And in answer I say it is the part which enables an employer to force a man seeking work to a sign a contract to submit any differences to arbitration under this act, and thus force obedience to any of its provisions, however harsh and unjust.

I then pass to call my friend's attention and the attention of the House to what appears to me to be a matter that ought to be corrected. I refer to lines 20 to 24, on page 6, as to the shortness of time of notice, and again answer my friend that the words are:

At the expiration of ten days from the decision of the circuit court upon exceptions taken to said award, as aforesaid, judgment shall be entered in accordance with said decision unless during said ten days either party shall appeal therefrom to the circuit court of appeals.

Ordinarily it is provided that one may give his notice of appeal——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I ask for a few minutes more.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I respectfully ask the House for an extension of five minutes in which I may conclude, my time having been taken up by my distinguished friend from Ohio in interruptions and interrogations.

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Washington be extended ten minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have yielded ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]. After that——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen who have discussed the bond feature of the war-tax bill seem to labor under the hallucination that differences of opinion as to the merits of that measure are not permissible. They say they stand ready to vote for this or any other war measure that may be brought before this body, and some have gone so far as to intimate that willingness to follow their example is the test of patriotism. Instead of discussing the merits of the proposed issue of bonds, instead of undertaking to show that it is necessary, they rush to swallow it without investigation, and as a further evidence that they are the most patriotic men now on earth they assure us that in thus dealing with a grave business and financial problem they rise above party and are guided solely by a desire for the country's welfare.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen should take need lest by airily arising above their party they fall below the level of common sense. Instead of justifying support of the proposition to add $500,000,000 to the bonded debt by boastful assurances of their devotion to the country, they should remember that the subject is one which could be more usefully discussed by substituting candid discussion of the condition and probable necessities of the Treasury for matters more interesting as additions to the autobiographical literature of the country than as the contributions of statesmen to the examination of a very important public question.

Mr. Speaker, if it were true that the issue of $500,000,000 worth of bonds is necessary to the successful prosecution of the war, Congress would, without a dissenting voice, authorize their issue. But is such a step necessary? I do not believe it is necessary to issue a dollar's worth of bonds in order to equip our forces and conduct the war to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion.

We entered upon preparation for the struggle with $263,000,000 surplus money in the Treasury—$163,000,000 in excess of the $100,000,000 gold reserve.

The first appropriation for war purposes was $50,000,000. This left over and above the gold reserve $113,000,000 net surplus available for war purposes.

In addition to the issue of $500,000,000 worth of bonds, the war-tax bill authorizes the issue of $100,000,000 of short-time bonds or certificates of debt bearing 3 per cent, and it is estimated that the tax features of the bill will produce $90,000,000.

Here, then, is a proposal to provide a war fund of $813,000,000, and I again say to the gentlemen who have declared that patriotism requires concurrence in this proposal that the question presented is too important to be disposed of by flapdoodle oratory.

While I regard the proposed issue of $100,000,000 worth of debt certificates as unnecessary, had this been the only feature of the bill proposing an increase in the national debt, probably the measure would not have excited serious opposition. Allowing this feature to stand and striking out the paragraph authorizing the issue of $500,000,000 worth of bonds, the war-tax bill would certainly place the Treasury beyond the reach of danger and provide amply for the expenses of the war. Let me recapitulate:

Gross surplus in Treasury	$213,000,000
Deduct gold reserve	100,000,000
Surplus available for war purposes	113,000,000
Estimated revenues from war-tax bill	90,000,000
Derivable from short-time debt certificates	100,000,000
Total	303,000,000

Add to this $100,000,000 that could be made available by the issue of $58,000,000 in the Treasury and the coinage of the seigniorage amounting to $42,000,000, and the war fund would be swelled to $403,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, who on this floor will hazard his reputation by basing his support of this measure upon the assumption that the war with Spain will necessitate the expenditure between now and the 1st day of next January of $303,000,000? Is this an insufficient sum for the defrayment of the expenses of the war until the next session of Congress, even admitting that the war will continue so long?

I have heretofore reminded the House that, measured in gold, the expense of the great civil war, during which we maintained armies seven times greater than will be called into the field during this war and a naval armament of 1,200 ships, with a blockade extending from Chesapeake Bay to the Rio Grande, was less than $300,000,000 a year.

Are we not warranted in the belief that the bond feature of the bill is unnecessary? Sir, excluding not only the proposal to issue $500,000,000 in bonds, but striking out also the paragraph authorizing the issue of $100,000,000 debt certificates, I feel quite sure the bill would produce revenues sufficient to pay the expenses of the war.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Especially with a hundred millions in the Treasury over and above the gold reserve.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes. As I have shown, taking into the account the net Treasury surplus, the bill, with the features providing for $500,000,000 worth of bonds and $100,000,000 stricken out, would create a war fund of $203,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, almost unitedly the Democrats on this floor are opposed to this proposition. They do not believe that a war fund of $813,000,000 is needed to equip our forces for war with a country like Spain, a physical, mental, moral, and financial paralytic and imbecile—a power so inconsequential that if our Army and Navy were given a free hand to deal with it, it would be crushed like an eggshell before the end of the summer.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But they will hurry the issue of bonds anyhow, in order to impound the greenbacks in the Treasury.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I think the gentleman from Mississippi has summarized the whole case in a few words. And it should not be forgotten that this bond feature of the bill will not become inoperative with the end of the war. After the war is over it will remain in full force and effect. If it only vested the Secretary of the Treasury with the power of issuing bonds as a means of raising a war fund, it would be sufficiently objectionable, but the fact that it clothes the executive department of the Government with a continuing power to increase the interest-bearing debt renders it doubly odious.

Sir, I am unalterably opposed to any law investing the Executive with any such authority. Instead of enacting new laws authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds, the obsolete statute under which Secretary Carlisle carried on a thriving business in back-room bond deals should be repealed.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment it is improbable, if not impossible, that the war with Spain will cost exceeding $300,000,000 a year. This bill proposes to create a war fund of $813,000,000—enough money to pay the expense of the war for two years and eight months at the least. Why, sir, if all this money were now in the Treasury, and we had before us estimates placing the probable expenses of the war at $300,000,000 a year, and felt positively certain that the war would continue so long, we would be powerless under the Constitution to appropriate more than enough to carry on the war for two years. Here, then, is a bill which proposes to authorize the creation of a war fund larger than this Congress has constitutional power to appropriate, and gentlemen insist that patriotism commands them to support it. They would have us believe that the struggle upon which the country has entered is so desperate, its result so uncertain, that at the very outset, before a gun has been fired, we should make provision more than sufficient for the defrayment of the expenses of a war with combined Europe.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the members of the Committee on Finance, or any considerable number of the members of this body entertain this absurd view of the situation. From the outset I have predicted that the death roll of the victims of riots in Spanish cities would exceed the losses of the naval and military forces of the United States. The giant of modern nations is about to crush a serpent that somehow has managed to survive as the sole exponent of mediæval barbarism. It will be quickly done and the world will be the better for it.

Mr. Speaker, provision for a war fund of $813,000,000 has been justified on the ground that war under existing circumstances will be far more expensive than it has been in times past. This is only partly true. The cost of heavy armament and of war on the seas has increased enormously, but the ordinary expenses of an army in the field would not be larger but smaller than they were during our great civil war. It is impossible, in the brief time at my disposal, to go into details, but I mention as items the cost of which would be smaller, transportation, the cost of small arms, clothing, camp equipage, and all other ordinary supplies.

Mr. Speaker, what does the Administration propose to do with a war fund of $813,000,000? Two or three naval battles, riotry in every hamlet in Spain, the occupation of Cuba without serious loss of life, and the independence of the island, followed by concerted action of foreign powers in the pacification of the remnant of Spain, will be written as a new chapter in American schoolbooks before next New Year's day. Entertaining this opinion, I unhesitatingly refuse to support any proposition sanctioning a large increase in the interest-bearing debt of the country.

I make no apology for questioning the motives of the author of the bond-issue feature of the war-tax bill. I accept as true the current report that it originated with the Secretary of the Treasury. I call attention to the fact that in the exalted station to which he never should have been called he is distinctively the mouthpiece and representative of the national banking system. Hundreds of millions of 3 per cent bonds would enormously facilitate the propaganda in favor of retiring all other forms of paper currency except national-bank notes. As has been suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the issue of bonds would result in locking up greenbacks in the Treasury—a long step in the direction of fastening the Gage financial policy upon the people. As I have before said, after the war is over, this law, if enacted, will remain upon the statute books and may be resorted to for this purpose.

Mr. Speaker, in times of national peril I am disposed to attribute to every citizen, whether rich or poor, motives of the highest patriotism, but I can not shut my eyes to truths which, over and over again, history has made apparent. If, through the medium of war, nations have achieved independence and peoples liberty, it is nevertheless true that in time of war it has not unfrequently happened that selfish and unpatriotic interests have prospered amazingly. The Napoleonic wars in Europe brought ruin to millions, but to a few hundreds it brought enormous fortunes. The great civil war in this country entailed unheard-of sacrifices upon the multitude, but during its progress the stock-jobber, the money lender, and financial desperado prospered as never before. Millions contended in innumerable battles, while other millions toiled in field, shop, factory, and mine, to provide the sinews of war.

A few, mostly the harpies and vultures of the Stock Exchange, saw in the momentous contest, not the struggle of a great nation for existence, but an opportunity to prey upon the state and the people.

The great bankers of the money centers felt no hesitancy in cornering gold, thereby preying upon the revenues and commerce of the country.

I give notice that I shall avail myself of the first favorable opportunity to review in this Chamber the history of national finances during the civil-war period and for a few years afterwards, contenting myself meantime with the declaration that from 1865 until this hour succeeding policies of the Treasury have been a succession of blunders interspersed with schemes of plunder hatched by bond dealers and stock jobbers.

It is familiarity with this history that impels me to the belief that the bond-issue feature of the tax bill was not dictated by motives of patriotism. The Secretary of the Treasury saw an opportunity to extort from the American Congress the passage of a measure which under ordinary circumstances would not have been entertained by this body. Originally a "peace-at-any-price" patriot, the Secretary of the Treasury has signalized his first appearance in the capacity of a defender of his country by injecting into this war measure a section intended to conserve the interests of the great banks at the money centers, of which his Chicago banking house is a specimen.

Mr. Speaker, I grant you that in time of war the people, rich and poor alike, are patriotic. The exceptions, few in number, only prove the rule. But, nevertheless, the language employed by the men who, in time of need rush to the defense of the country, differs from the response heard in the great banking houses of New York and Boston. The volunteer who shoulders a musket or steps upon the deck of a battle ship, thereby offers his life as a sacrifice upon the altar of his country. The manager of a bond syndicate who, sometimes, by conspiracy with the national Executive, which shields him from competition, subscribes to a national loan and closes a good deal in the back room of the Secretary's office, may cry never so loudly that it is an act of patriotism, but we know and the world knows that he is "trapping for fur." We know, and the world knows, that patriotism has nothing to do with the transaction. The language of the patriot who takes the field in defense of his country is, "I give;" the language of the bond dealer, manager of the international bankers' syndicate, is, "I lend—at usury."

Sir, let no man misconstrue my language into a reflection upon the wealthy men of this country. I refer only to the class of brokers and bankers, who, by their deeds, have signified such selfishness, not to say depravity, as to justify the people of this country in regarding them as public plunderers. I refer to the coparceners of Grover Cleveland and John G. Carlisle, who, during the Cleveland Administration, successfully engineered schemes by which the taxpayers of this country were plundered to the extent of $20,000,000. I refer to the class to which they belong—a class whose maxim is "business is business," and who, in their relations to the public have lost the power to discriminate between right and wrong, between foul play and honesty, between legitimate profits and grand larceny. I call attention to the fact that during the Administration of Mr. Cleveland, J. Pierpont Morgan, of London and New York, the American representative of this class, exercised paramount influence in the Treasury Department; that the advent of the present Administration saw no diminution of his influence, and therefore it is not difficult to determine the source whence this proposition to issue $500,000,000 worth of bonds emanated.

Mr. Speaker, to me it seems extraordinary that any gentleman on the other side of the Chamber should inject into the discussion of this measure even an intimation that opposition to it indicates a disposition to withhold necessary provision for the expenses of the war. Measures imposing taxes, and especially extraordinary taxes, should never be enacted without careful investigation and full discussion. For want of time I refrain from discussing the tax features of the bill, but venture to suggest to the gentlemen who have so precipitately swallowed the measure, bond issues and all, that it would have been wise to lay a part of the burdens imposed by the war upon the wealth of the country. Who dares to say that the fact that I entertain this opinion stamps me as wanting in patriotism?

I think the people of this country would prefer increased taxation sufficient to pay the expense of the war to an increase in the interest-bearing debt. Am I, therefore, to be denounced as unpatriotic?

Gentlemen, I say to you that the people are opposed to an increase in the national debt; that they are in favor of paying for the war in spot cash, and that instead of desiring fresh issues of bonds they insist upon paying off the existing interest-bearing debt as rapidly as possible. Does this justify the charge that I am unwilling to provide a sufficient war fund?

I am in favor of coining the seigniorage and issuing sufficient greenbacks to add $100,000,000 to the currency. I think this should have been done a long while ago. I would favor it as a peace measure. When the exigencies of war are said to require large additions to the receipts of the Treasury, must I forego the advocacy of a policy which, even if no emergency existed, I would support?

Are members of this Chamber to have no right of opinion as to a scheme of taxation and a proposal to enormously increase the national debt because, forsooth, the great national banker at the head of the Treasury Department has sent here a measure manifestly outrageous and unnecessary? For one, as to this and every other measure brought into this Chamber, I reserve the right to think and investigate for myself, and in time of war no less than in time of peace I shall be especially vigilant in scrutinizing recommendations made by the bond mongers through the medium of the Treasury Department.

But we are told that this is a nonpartisan measure and therefore it should go through the House without division. Is it a nonpartisan measure? The bond-issue feature was invented by the Secretary of the Treasury and the taxing feature by the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Not a Democrat on the committee was consulted until the bill was ready to be reported to this body. When it was in readiness, to the last line and syllable, then the Democratic committeemen were invited to inspect the product of the industry of their Republican colleagues. The participation of the Democratic committeemen was strictly perfunctory. The bill was formulated by partisans, adopted in the committee room by a partisan vote, reported to the House backed by the Republican committeemen, and opposed by the minority members of the committee.

It is a partisan Republican measure—partisan in its every line and syllable. It lays none of the burden of war taxes upon the wealth of the country. It taxes the wants and necessities of the people and omits the taxation of classes best able to pay taxes. Only a Republican committee could have devised such a measure, and therefore to characterize it as nonpartisan is the height of absurdity.

But, Mr. Speaker, obnoxious as some of them are, if the committee had stopped with the taxing features of the bill, or even been content with provision for the issue of $100,000,000 worth of certificates of debt, as it is a war measure, the bill would not have been sufficiently objectionable to compel united opposition on this side of the House; but when Secretary Gage's $500,000,000 bond scheme was added, it converted what should have been a patriotic measure for national defense into a hybrid, in which are united two distinctive Republican heresies—the imposition of all taxation upon the poor and the perpetuation of the interest-bearing debt of the country.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion permit me to say that should the war continue long enough to require the collection of the war taxes for a single year and the issue of $100,000,000 worth of debt certificates, the necessity for a considerable addition to the volume of money in circulation will become so apparent as to indicate the wisdom of our demand for the addition of a hundred millions by the coinage of the seigniorage and the issue of additional Treasury notes.

When the pending measure becomes a law, even if the bond feature be eliminated before its final passage, we may expect the immediate sale of fifty or a hundred million worth of debt certificates. This will take out of circulation a corresponding amount of currency—mostly from the money centers. Contemporaneously the taxgatherer will exact several millions. A large proportion of the increased taxes will be paid by the people of five or six States and thirty or forty cities. I refer to the States and cities which produce most of the tobacco and beer upon which increased taxation will have to be paid.

Mr. LOUD. I thought the consumer paid the tax.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from California says the consumer will pay the tax. The fact that one Republican has so far progressed in knowledge of political economy as to sanction this manifest truism entitles him to congratulations. He seems to have grasped a fundamental principle of economics.

Mr. LOUD. You have departed from it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. No, I have not. The consumer will finally pay the tax, but in the first instance it will be paid by manufacturers and dealers in the places where the industries are located. This will make serious inroads upon the money supply of these neighborhoods, and the demand will come at a time when a reduction in bank reserves and available currency will be keenly felt. The tobacco tax will make heavy exactions upon Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut. The beer tax will make severe requisitions on St. Louis, Chicago, Cincinnati, Milwaukee, and twenty other large cities in the West and the great trade centers of the Atlantic seaboard. With a stringency in the central money markets created by the sale of debt certificates or bonds and a depletion of reserves elsewhere, caused by the payment of millions in taxes, if the war should continue for even six months it requires no gift of prophecy to foretell a monetary crisis as the inevitable consequence of the enactment and enforcement of the war-tax bill. To provide for this contingency, at least a hundred millions should be added to the circulating medium.

Mr. Speaker, entertaining these views, I voted against the passage of what I regard as the Gage war-tax bill. I do not call in question the patriotism of those who supported it, and I am amazed that any member of this body should attempt to justify support of the bill by exuberant and even extravagant proclamation of his devotion to the country and its flag, and by challenging the probity and patriotism of those who are opposed to it.

Mr. Speaker, some things can be taken for granted. For instance, I think it can be taken for granted that the individuals composing this body are patriotic American citizens. If any regard it as necessary to make frequent personal protestations of devotion, such exhibitions are at least harmless.

It is pertinent to observe, however, that in doing so they should not insinuate that colleagues who prefer a different course are necessarily unpatriotic. Those who prefer by investigation to arrive at definite opinions concerning methods of taxation, bond issues, and the like, and who do not feel called upon to prove their patriotism by foregoing this privilege, may fairly claim that thereby they afford no justification for the insinuation that they are not thoroughly devoted to the glory and welfare of the Republic.

Sir, I concede to each of my colleagues what I claim for myself—unfaltering devotion to the country and its institutions—and I do not believe that there is in this Chamber a Republican, Democrat, or Populist who does not feel himself commissioned by his constituents to offer on their behalf any sacrifice that may be made necessary by public necessity.

But, Mr. Speaker, it does not follow that we should be of one mind as to the best method of providing for the expense of the war. The measure brought in here by the Committee on Ways and Means was drawn on lines pointed out by fundamental Republican principles. It lays the whole burden of war taxes upon consumption, upon the wants and necessities of the people, upon the toilers and producers, upon those least able to bear additional exactions. Therefore it does not meet the unqualified support of the minority. Had the measure been drawn upon lines consonant with Democratic doctrines, it would have imposed a part of the burden upon wealth, upon what the citizen has instead of upon what he needs, upon the great corporations who have absorbed so large a portion of the country's wealth that in justice they ought to bear a part of its expenses, upon classes whose profits are largest and who could therefore well afford to bear a share of the extraordinary burdens of taxation.

The issue of bonds proposed by this bill dovetails into the Gage scheme for reorganizing the finances, to every part of which we are opposed. These differences of opinion led the Republicans to formulate a bill which has met the united opposition of this side of the Chamber. Republicans entertain one theory of taxation; we on this side another. There be those high in authority who regard a national debt as a national blessing. The minority in this Chamber and, I think, an overwhelming majority of the American people regard it as a burden and a curse. The Republicans believe in the gold standard and in the monopoly of paper issues by private banking corporations. The bimetallists regard the gold standard as an iniquity and the national banking system as its chief promoter. Running through every line and syllable of the feature of the war-tax measure which provides for bond issues is the sinister imprint of the bond juggler and the syndicate banker. Such a scheme should have had no place in a measure ostensibly devised for the protection and defense of the country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended to five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Missouri for his kindness.

In 1891 New Zealand offered and put through her Parliament a labor-arbitration bill which probably contains more perfected legislation and has been demonstrated to have more beneficial effect since then than any other measure that we have in view. Germany, Mr. Speaker, in 1878 proceeded in the same line.

I beg to call to the attention of the House that an appeal from New Zealand, passing through the intermediate stages of appeal, in due course reached the House of Lords, and last December the House of Lords decided that a purely voluntary bill endeavoring to arbitrate differences between master and servant, that provided no form of penalty and no form of remedy between persons, was a gratuitous enactment, and therefore vested no jurisdiction in a court to execute judgment, because it could not be reciprocal. Therefore, in my suggestions, I want to bring your attention to some amendments making it reciprocal, and if we do not do so, we are likely to inflict hardship upon the one or possibly give improper exemption to the other.

I must differ from my distinguished friend as to his meanings of the words "shall appeal therefrom." That is different from the words "gives notice of appeal," because our courts have construed the clause in so many divers ways. Every lawyer on this floor—though it may be I am only a tyro in the profession—will concede that those very words "shall appeal" have been decided to mean that he shall have perfected his appeal, and in many of our courts where a person has taken an appeal it has been held to mean such a stage as takes from the lower court all jurisdiction in the matter. To give notice of appeal is the usual provision. That is a provision as to the Supreme Court and as to appeals into the circuit court of appeals. I hope there will, therefore, be a provision of that kind in this act, in order that there may be no indefiniteness about the matter. The last position that I desire to bring to the attention of the committee is that on page 7:

> The determination of said court of appeals upon said question shall be final, and, being certified by the clerk thereof to said circuit court, judgment pursuant thereto shall thereupon be entered by said court.

Will any lawyer here tell me what kind of judgment is to be entered by that court? Gentlemen, do you mean that it is to be entered for the purpose of enforcing this award? Do you provide any means of enforcing any judgment? Do you mean damages under the award shall remain as a judgment between the employer and the employed or judgment in the confiscation of his wages for violating the award or declining to be bound thereby? What judgment shall be entered under this bill?

There is another clause you mean to enter final judgment in the court, and thereupon the court, in the exercise of equity, may make such judgment as it sees fit. Shall the judgment be one to enjoin the laborer, prohibit him, or discharge him, or hold him in contempt? Why do you decline to state exactly what kind or manner of judgment? This is done in every other form of legislation or litigation from a damage suit for the killing of a cow to the foreclosure of a railroad mortgage; from the suit for wages to an action involving human life. Why now give an uncontrolled discretion and unlimited opportunity to the Federal judges as against this employee that is not permitted in any other instance or experience in legislation or litigation? It is too dangerous.

If it is intended to hurt the weak, we must curb it. If it is not so intended, no harm comes of defining its limits. For this reason I think that that provision above all must be amended. Many other amendments are necessary to prevent this bill, apparently a friend to labor, from being its most disastrous engine of oppression. As the gentleman from Ohio will permit none of these evils to be further disclosed or discussion on this side extended, I must, as my limit of time has exhausted, submit my amendments in hopes to make a good and righteous bill of this measure. [Applause.]

I now tender as an addenda the bill I have prepared and introduced to meet such conditions as labor generally might be benefited by:

A bill (H. R. 9806) to create a national board of arbitration for labor disputes or conflicts between master and servant, and to appropriate therefor.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purposes of this act there shall be constituted nine circuits in the United States, which shall be known as arbitration circuits, respectively, 1 to 9. The circuits shall contain respective States as follows, to wit: At each State election of each State in the respective circuits named herein, held according to the law of the said State, there shall be elected by such forms of election as prevail in the said State one officer, who shall be known as labor referee, which officer shall be male, of age not less than 25 years, a citizen of the United States, whose duties shall be to preside in all instances of arbitration in the said State in manner hereinafter prescribed, whose compensation shall be $1,200 per annum and such expenses for traveling and other necessary incidentals as shall be allowed upon vouchers by the Commissioner of Labor of the United States. The duties of said referee of labor shall be to attend in all instances of dispute or controversy between an employer and employee wherever his services shall, under the provisions of this act, be demanded.

SEC. 2. That in all cases wherever any dispute or difference between employer and employee can not be harmoniously adjusted between them either shall have the right of requesting the services of the labor referee, which referee shall, upon such request, permit the employer to name one person, the employees, through themselves or association, as they may choose, to name another person, said selected persons and said referee to constitute a board of arbitration.

SEC. 3. That said referee is herein granted authority to hold sittings, together with the chosen referees, at such place as shall be commodious and convenient to all persons concerned, within ten days from the time of the complaint, and said referee shall bring before the said board by process under his signature all such persons as shall be requested, either of the parties to the controversy or the members of the said board, as may advise and inform the said board of the conditions of the controversy from which a just conclusion by the said board as to the respective rights of the contestants may be had: Provided, That the referee shall have discretion of limiting the amount of witnesses of each State to such number as under and by the circumstances would appear to him just in the premises.

SEC. 4. That either party interested in the arbitration as employer or employee may have the aid of counsel, advocate, or friend before the said board to represent and speak for them.

SEC. 5. That the said hearing of the said board and the proceedings in all cases, to taking testimony and granting hearings, shall be public: Provided,

That the said referee shall have power to maintain order and decorum at the said hearing to the full extent as United States court commissioners are now allowed by law; and said referee shall have the same authority to summon before him witnesses, under process of his hand, to the same extent and with the same power that the said United States circuit court commissioners have now by law.

SEC. 6. That the said hearings of the said board shall be continued to its termination, the proceedings thereof to be taken down in writing at the request of each party to the controversy, to be preserved for any purpose of appeal hereinafter prescribed by this act.

SEC. 7. That the clerk which shall hereafter be named as clerk to the appeal board shall act as clerk to each hearing of the board of labor referees whenever the same is had: Provided, That whenever a session of the appeal board of arbitration conflicts with the session of any local board of arbitration the clerk of the appeal board of arbitration may designate a deputy to the local referee for the purpose of the appeal hearing, who shall receive such per diem equal to that paid jurors in the United States courts.

SEC. 8. That in each of the circuits herein named there is by this act constituted a circuit arbitration board. Each board shall consist of all the State labor referees in the particular circuit in which the dispute has arisen and is being held—that is to say, such referees in the said circuit with the exception of the particular referee from whose decision the said case is appealed. It is intended by this act that each circuit herein named shall constitute a circuit arbitration court of appeal on the same order and within the same plan as the Federal circuit court of appeals now prescribed as to litigation and cause at law in the several circuits. The said circuit arbitration appeal board shall assemble and hold session at such places as shall be agreed upon by them with a view to the convenience of all the persons interested, holding sessions as often as they shall prescribe by rules and in any other instance where they shall be petitioned by any local referee from whose decision there has been an appeal, or by either person or party to the appeal where the said appeal has been perfected. The said board shall appoint a clerk, whose duties shall be such as prescribed by the appeal board, who shall receive a compensation of $1,200 per annum.

SEC. 9. That any person to any arbitration, or any party possessed of interest therein as suitor, feeling himself or themselves aggrieved at the decision of the said referee or of the local board of arbitration called in by the said party at the instance of the parties interested, such aggrieved person or party may appeal from the decision of the said local board to the circuit board of arbitration as herein provided, the said appeal to be taken by giving notice of the appeal, which notice shall set forth the alleged grounds of grievances and errors of the decision in ordinary and concise language, and shall be filed within ten days after the decision of the local board has been rendered, and thereupon the said local board shall cause to have sent to the circuit appeal board of arbitration for that particular circuit all of the papers and evidence and all the proceedings had before the said local board, which transmitting of papers shall be done by the appeal board who have duly certified that the same are correct and complete. No appeal shall be dismissed by the appeal board for mere omission of form, but shall be heard upon its merits in all instances when taken within time as prescribed by this act.

SEC. 10. That the said appeal board shall, with speed and such haste as the justice of the cause may permit, hear the said appeal after giving notice to all persons concerned and render ruling thereupon, it being necessary that a majority of the State appeal board shall concur in any ruling or decision for the same to have the effect of a decision or ruling upon the appeal.

SEC. 11. That in all cases where the circuit appeal board of arbitration shall make a decision it shall at once notify the parties interested as contestants of the said decision, which said decision shall be binding as a decision upon the merits of the controversy at issue.

SEC. 12. That wherever any party or person interested, or as party to the hearing before the said local or appeal board, shall, after either decision has become final, refuse to abide by the said ruling or said decision, either person or party to the said arbitration may make such showing of such refusal to abide by such decision of any party to the arbitration, and then and there any local court which would have jurisdiction of any litigation over the said party or person refusing to abide the final decision of the said arbitration shall have full authority in the exercise of its jurisdiction to take charge of the said business of the said employer, or that branch of the same out of which the difference grew and had arisen, and make such equitable disposition of the management of the said business as the rights of the person involved as to him shall seem meet and proper under the circumstances of the case, it being prescribed that no condition of citizenship of the person complained of shall oust or defeat the jurisdiction of the said court to act as herein provided. In all instances where it is the employee who willfully refuses to obey the final decision of the arbitration board when it shall appear to the judge that the decision was just, said employee shall have no further right to demand arbitration, either by the local or the appeal board, provided always that the said employer and employee is hereby granted the right to at any time reconcile their own differences, notwithstanding any award.

SEC. 13. That no local referee shall accept or take from either person interested or connected with the said arbitration any fee, compensation, reward, or gift of any nature whatsoever. Any violation of this provision shall be punishable by any court having jurisdiction of bribery as a misdemeanor by the fine of $1,000 and the forfeiting of the office of the said referee.

SEC. 14. That such persons as may be called in by the said State referee to sit with him in any hearing as shall be designated by the parties to the controversy shall receive $5 per day during the time of their sitting.

SEC. 15. That no political creed, religious conviction, or condition of nationality shall in anywise affect for or against any person who shall be offered as assistant to the State referee by either person to the controversy.

SEC. 16. That this act shall be administered under the supervision and direction of the Commissioner of Labor of the United States, who is hereby authorized to prescribe such regulations as shall be necessary for the proper guidance of the said local boards as to his judgment shall seem meet and proper.

SEC. 17. That this act is to be construed liberally, with a view of effecting its object, which is to arbitrate all labor disputes peaceably and amicably.

SEC. 18. That there is hereby appropriated for the execution of this act $100,000, which said sum is to be paid out under the supervision of the Commissioner of Labor through such regulations as he shall prescribe for the carrying out of the provisions of this law.

SEC. 19. That all contracts for the performance of labor which are herein to be made, if in contravention to the terms and purposes of this act, shall to that extent be null and void.

SEC. 20. That this act take effect from and after its approval.

SEC. 21. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE].

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask whether the Chair knows of any way by which the second member on the Committee on Labor can get any chance to be heard upon this question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not know the gentleman wanted to be heard. I will gladly yield him time.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I do not want to be heard by the permission of a gentleman who is not on our committee, but in my own right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to his hour.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am simply occupying the hour allotted to me.

[Mr. MAGUIRE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, as a member for nearly forty years of New York Typographical Union, No. 6, and as a Representative from the State of New York in this Congress for nearly twelve years, I shall vote for this bill because it is asked for by the confederated railroad employees of the United States. I shall vote for the bill all the more willingly if the amendments suggested by my friend from California and my friend from Washington are adopted.

But, Mr. Speaker, this House is a part of the Government of the United States, and he who wants others to be clean should himself be clean. I know of no more unjust employer than the Government of the United States. I received this morning a letter from Joseph W. Irwin, a caulker in Brooklyn, a member of the Caulkers' Union, who was working in the navy-yard at Brooklyn as a first-class mechanic. He had worked there at intervals since 1898, making three or four months in the year. In that time he never had any complaint against him in regard to either work or conduct. All his discharge cards had been marked "excellent" or "good." On March 28 he reported for work. On the 29th he was told that he would be reduced to the second class at $3.04 a day. The wages of caulkers in New York for the last twenty-one years has been $3.25 a day. The Caulkers' Union does not permit its members to work for less. Like an honest man, Irwin refused to accept a less rate, and resigned.

After his resignation he was entitled to a card from the labor board, composed of officers of the Navy, giving his rating. The rating on the card given to him was this:

JOS. W. IRWIN, Caulker:

Discharged at your own request.
Your general workmanship has been good.
Your general conduct has been poor.

F. T. BOWLES,
Naval Constructor, United States Navy.

"Poor," eh? Why? Because he refused to work at a rate of wages lower than that prescribed by his trade union. When he asked why his conduct was marked "poor," he was told that it was because he refused to work. The word "poor" on the card debars him from work in the yard for one year. If his conduct had been marked "good," he could have placed his name on the eligible list and been in line for more work. As a workman I know him to be the peer of any man in the yard. The record of the labor bureau there will show that he never lost an hour of his own will, and never had a complaint against him.

Yet the Government stigmatizes him because he refused to violate his pledge to his union and refuses him further work for a year. Irwin had been foreman in three of the most prominent shipyards in New York. The war has tied up business and the only place for him to earn a dollar at present is in the navy-yard. He has a wife who has been on a sick bed for two years, and he needs the work.

I did think and I do think that when the Committee on Labor of this House are taking into account labor bills similar to the one which is now before the House they should do something to protect labor-union men who are in the employ of the United States Government. This great Government enlists printers, saddlers, harness makers, members of various trades, into its service as privates in the Army and Navy, and then details them to their trade under the Government, and refuses to pay them union-rate wages. In most cases these wages are not half the union rates.

I think, Mr. Speaker, this matter ought to be probed to the bottom, and that in time to come, and I hope that time will come quickly, all of the outrages which have been committed by the Government on its employees in this direction will be righted by the action of the Congress of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the one minute which remains to me I desire to read a single paragraph from the Philadelphia Ledger of this morning, which is copied from a letter written by a correspondent of the London Times. I find in this paper this sentence:

The truth is that a combination of unimportant papers, led by the Journal and represented at Washington by yellow Congressmen and Senators, such as THURSTON and CUMMINGS and others, are on Mr. Hearst's salary list.

I want to say, sir, that I regret very much that this statement has never been true in the past and is not true in the present. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask permission to extend my remarks made to-day in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time I shall occupy the attention of the House on this bill by the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio I desire to say that I am in favor of it, and shall vote for it, or for any other bill that will, in my judgment, benefit, as I believe this bill will benefit, the labor organizations throughout the United States.

This bill is necessarily in the nature of an experiment. It is a step, however, in the right direction. It is but the beginning of what we hope will be accomplished in the near future, when labor shall receive its just reward and its just recognition. This bill may benefit organized labor, or it may be like many other laws now on the statute books—a dead letter. It will depend to a great extent on the courts. We can not tell now just how the courts will construe some of the provisions of this bill, and until that is done no one can tell whether this bill will be in the interest of the workers or not. The labor organizations represented here by their delegates favor this bill and want it to pass. I am guided largely by their wishes, for I have always found them honest, intelligent, fearless, and efficient.

These gentlemen, representing the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, the Order of Railway Conductors, the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, and the Order of Railroad Telegraphers, are unanimously and heartily in favor of the passage of this bill. I believe they know what they want, and I think we should accede to their wishes in this matter. They hope and believe this bill will do some good, and that at all events it can do no harm to organized labor. In that opinion I am inclined to concur, although I have not had the time to study and consider this bill in all its details as its importance, in my opinion, would warrant.

There is one thing this bill does that I like, and that is, it recognizes by law for the first time, I believe, organized labor and its rights.

Let me say what many of you know, that I am now, always have been, and always will be, a friend of organized labor. I stand for the rights of the toilers, the workers, and the masses, and in my humble way will always do all in my power to advance their interests and protect their privileges.

This bill does not go far enough to suit me. It gives no additional benefit to, and confers no more advantage on, the men who work for the railroads. As I understand it, the bill simply gives the employee the same rights before the law as the employer now has. I believe the bill could be made much more advantageous to the best interests of organized labor by an amendment or two, but I want to see the bill pass, and instead of attempting to amend the bill at this time, I will content myself by voting for the amendments to be offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS], and if those amendments are voted down, then I shall vote for this bill just as it is, on the theory that half a loaf is better than no bread.

I hope it will become a law as speedily as possible, and I trust if the courts are called on to construe its provisions at some future time the judge or the judges will remember that this bill passed the House of Representatives as a labor bill, in the interest of labor, and not for the advantage of the corporations or for the benefit of the railroads.

In case the question of legislative intent should subsequently arise in some legal proceeding growing out of a contention regarding the construction and meaning of this bill, if it should become a law, I now deliberately place this statement on record, for the guidance and information of the court, that this bill is a labor bill, intended to aid organized labor, and should be construed, where any doubt exists, liberally and favorably in the interest of the employee.

If this is done, it will prove a good law; if it is not done, but on the contrary the provisions of this bill are construed by the courts in the interests of the employers, the railroads, then I am afraid this measure will be a delusion and a snare so far as organized labor is concerned. Let us pass this bill this afternoon and hope for the best. The fears of the critics of this measure may never be realized, and all the hopes of its friends may, and let us hope will, be justified.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will do all that its friends claim. If it does, it will accomplish a great deal of good. It is in the right direction, and ought to be followed by other bills to aid organized labor. All railroad employees and persons generally engaged in interstate commerce, who are most affected by this bill, are in favor of it, and have been most anxious to secure the enactment of a measure that, to some extent, will put an end to the industrial wars that have resulted from disputes growing out of questions of wages, hours of labor, and the conditions of employment between the employer and the employee. I hope and trust this measure will solve, at least to some extent, these difficulties.

Bills similar to this have twice heretofore received the approval of this House, but too late to pass the Senate. I believe it is true, as a general proposition, that public opinion and organized labor favor arbitration for the speedy settlement of disputes between corporations and their employees. This bill seeks to do this, although in no sense does it provide for compulsory arbitration, and if it should become a law will not, in my opinion, solve the labor problem or entirely prevent strikes; but it will do something to steady the parties to the controversy and be a powerful influence for a peaceful settlement of disputes between employer and employee, growing out of interstate-commerce controversies.

But, sir, if you really want to do something for the working people in this country, why do you not take up and pass the labor-commission bill, the eight-hour bill, the bill to tax out of existence the sweating shops, the bill to prevent prison-made goods from being sold outside of the State in which they are made, and several other bills demanded by organized labor all over the country and really in their interest and for their benefit?

These bills were introduced early in this Congress, and there is no reason, no excuse, why they have not been considered and passed long ere this. You will delay action on these bills until it is too late. Let us take up, consider, and pass the eight-hour bill and the labor-commission bill immediately after the passage of the measure now under consideration. If you Republicans will do this you will indeed do something for organized labor. Fail to do it, and you will hear from the people, from the workers and the toilers in the coming campaign. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say in less than two minutes that every objection which has been urged against the pending bill has been considered in committee and is answered in the text of the bill itself.

The gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] seems to be troubled lest the bill should impose upon somebody an obligation to work after he wants to quit.

The objection to the provision "that the employee who quits the service of his employer must give thirty days' written notice of his intention to do so" is specifically answered by the words "without just cause," in line 4, page 9, which were inserted for the sole purpose of preserving to the laborer every right to decide for himself as to what constitutes a reason for quitting, unless it be the specific thing involved in the arbitration. His right to quit for every other cause without the notice required by the bill is preserved.

As to the effect of the order of the court which causes anxiety to the gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from California, I take it to be an entirely sound proposition that when the law says that the party shall not be imprisoned for contempt for violation of the order of the court, it does not mean that the court may enjoin him from violating the order and then punish him for the disobedience of the injunction. The court can not do by indirection that which it is forbidden to do directly.

And, Mr. Speaker, I conclude within my two minutes by repeating that the objections which have been urged against the bill are answered by the bill itself. Gentlemen are talking about the bill in the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses, not the bill before them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, how much time, may I ask, is remaining to me?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has been exhausted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee, I would like to have consent of the House to be heard for a few moments on this proposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts, a member of the Committee on Labor, be permitted to address the House for ten minutes.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I want to thank the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the House for this privilege. Being the second member on the Committee on Labor, and supposing I was to have some rights on the floor, I am very glad to get ten minutes by the permission of the gentleman from Ohio and the House.

Mr. DALZELL. You are welcome.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. It is a very great favor. The smallest of favors are thankfully received.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that this bill which I hold in my hand, and which the House is now considering, is a bill of the very greatest moment and import. It will be the first bill passed by Congress that recognizes and makes lawful and legal the "labor organizations" of this country and allows the workingmen of this country in their organizations to stand on the same plane as the great railroad organizations of this country.

The laboring men of this country ask no immunity from any law or any hardship that is visited upon the great corporations, and protest against suffering any disabilities the great corporations do not suffer. They ask to be put on the same plane before the courts and before the law. This bill proposes to recognize them as standing on the same plane, that the law pro and con shall be the same between the humblest organized laborers employed by these great railroad corporations and the corporations employing them. I hope this House will pass this bill without amending it by dotting an "i" or crossing a "t." It has been thought and worked out with the very greatest care, and the chairman of the committee [Mr. GARDNER] has only been permitted two minutes to call the attention of this House to the bill, and only to page 9, where it provides that the cause of employees "shall in equity be taken into consideration."

This legislation, being a recognition of the labor organizations, putting them on the same plane with the great railroad corporations, is the first step in a long line of legislation by which the twentieth century is to be ushered in. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] may rest assured that he will only further the progress of the organization of the men for whom he speaks by allowing the men who have recognition in this law to receive that legal recognition which they are seeking at the hands of the Congress and of the courts of the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. I will ask the gentleman if this bill does not contemplate involuntary servitude?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. This bill does not contemplate involuntary servitude.

Mr. KELLEY. On page 9——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I can not yield. I have but a moment. This bill is very carefully drawn. It has had the benefit of the careful consideration it has received at the hands of all the labor organizations connected with railroads and the consideration which it has received by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Bureau of Labor, and it has been submitted to the Attorney-General of the United States, to be sure that it is brought within the provisions of the Constitution and is equitable to both parties. Both parties are perfectly and thoroughly protected, as much so as is possible.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Very briefly; yes.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Has it come to this in our country that there must be special laws passed in order that one man may be put upon the same plane as another? Does not the Constitution guarantee to every man the same rights?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. The Constitution guarantees to every man the same rights, but there must be provisions of law to make those guarantees of rights effective. Here is a provision of law to make some of those guaranteed rights effective. The Constitution may declare that every man shall have certain rights; but that does not give them to him unless there is provided by law how he may protect himself and secure his rights.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Does the gentleman pretend to say that the law is not——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Five minutes more.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas for just one question, and then I must have my time.

Mr. MCRAE. I want to ask the gentleman if I correctly understood the statement that this bill meets with the approval of the representatives of the labor organizations?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Every labor organization connected with railroad traffic has approved of this bill and asked that it be enacted into law.

Now, one word about the decisions of the courts and sending men to jail, and so forth. This is new legislation. All laws of this character take the chances of legal decisions, and of the wisdom, discretion, and justice of courts. There is no long line of precedents that we can quote to the House, under this law or similar laws. This law is a new thing in the legislation of this country.

I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this House and the country and the laboring men in the country have confidence in the justice and wisdom of the decisions of the courts, and we will soon have a long line of precedents in their defense and in their interest if we will but give the courts a chance under this bill. They will put the labor organizations upon the same plane and the same level as the great railroad corporations are put, and that is what is asked in this bill. I have been an employer and have been a workman, and while during the latter years of my life I have been an employer, I am known as a friend of labor, and have defended the labor organizations in my own factory, and in the State legislature, and everywhere from the first, and long before it was anything but unpopular and a discredit to a man to do it.

If there is any man in my State who has the confidence of and has a right to speak for the laboring people and the labor organizations, I claim to have it. Now, I say again in closing, as I began, put the organized workingmen who are in the employ of the railroads on the same plane with the corporations employing them, and let the courts determine their rights under this law by their decisions, and we will correct this law if it needs it, for Congress meets again in December, and once a year from now on as in the past.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore proceeded to put the question.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I desire to ask whether the amendments of which I gave notice to the House of my desire to offer are cut off by my distinguished friend asking the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair's understanding is that they are.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MAXWELL. If I can have the opportunity, I will state that I am in favor of a fair arbitration bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MAXWELL. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nothing is in order except the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two, three, or five minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will not object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill was presented to the House, and an hour's discussion has taken place. It is a very important bill, and it should be thoroughly discussed and all its provisions considered. Now, I say that there are a number of good provisions in this bill, but there are a number that are very objectionable; and the bill has not been considered as it should be. It is a matter of great importance both to the employers and to the employees. In a word, a bill of this kind should not be put through under whip and spur, with no one to represent the employees on this side; and it does seem to me that the bill should be recommitted to the committee and further considered and some additional provisions inserted. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be recommitted.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order yet. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly engrossed, and read the third time.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I move to recommit the bill with the following instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington moves to recommit the bill with the instructions which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the bill be recommitted to the committee with the following instructions:

Insert in line 10, page 5, after the word "court," the following:

"Not punished in any other manner, nor forfeit any wages nor sum of money due or to be due."

Insert in line 2, page 6, after the word "discharge," the following:

"Or be liable to any damage suffered through the violation of this provision."

In line 20, page 6, strike out "ten days" and insert "thirty days;" also, in line 23, strike out the words "ten days" and insert "thirty days;" also, in line 23, page 6, after the words "either party shall give notice of appeal."

Amendment by Mr. LEWIS of Washington:

Strike out the clause beginning in line 4 with the words "the determination," down to and including the words "circuit court."

Insert in line 8, page 5, after the word "business," the following:

"Or any State court having jurisdiction of the persons or subject-matter."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 86.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit without instructions.

The SPEAKER. There can be only one motion to recommit, and that has been disagreed to. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MAXWELL. A motion to recommit will be in order.

The SPEAKER. A motion to recommit will not be in order. Only one motion to recommit is in order. The gentleman could have amended by moving to strike out the instructions; but not now.

Mr. MAXWELL. Well, only one motion is in order on the subject?

The SPEAKER. Only one, under the rules of the House. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HANNAH LETCHER STEVENSON.

Mr. RAY of New York. I present the conference report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 439) granting a pension to Mrs. Hannah Letcher Stevenson, widow of the late Brig. Gen. John D. Stevenson, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House of Representatives, and agree to the same.

GEO. W. RAY,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
Managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

JAMES H. KYLE,
LUCIEN BAKER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

Statement to accompany conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses in the matter of the bill S. 439, being "An act granting a pension to Mrs. Hannah Letcher Stevenson, widow of the late Brig. Gen. John D. Stevenson."

The conferees on the part of the House respectfully report and state:

That after full, free, and fair conference the conferees on the part of the Senate and the conferees on the part of the House have agreed as follows: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the Senate bill (S. 439) granting a pension to Mrs. Hannah Letcher Stevenson, widow of the late Brig. Gen. John D. Stevenson, and agree to the amendments made by the House. The effect of these amendments and of the report is as follows, viz:

1. The rate of pension granted by the Senate act was $50 per month, and this was reduced by the House to $30 per month, and the result of the conference agreement is that the rate stands at $30 per month, the amount allowed by the House.

2. Numbers 2, 3, and 4 were merely formal, and struck out the word "Mrs." and inserted the words "and pay her a pension," and also a provision that the increase granted by the bill shall be in lieu of the pension the widow now receives, and also amend the title to conform to the practice prevailing in both the Senate and the House.

The result of this conference agreement is to establish the principle contended for by the House in the case of widows of general officers, that an increase above $30 per month shall not be granted where the death of the officer was not due to wounds received or disabilities incurred in the service.

Dated May 5, 1898.

GEO. W. RAY,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RAY of New York. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The report was adopted.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INSIGNIA OF THE RED CROSS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1913) to protect the insignia and name of the Red Cross.

The bill was read.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand that the gentleman from New York has some objections to the bill, which may be obviated upon the consideration of the matter by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I therefore withdraw my request for the present consideration of the bill.

CLASSIFICATION OF LETTERS PATENT, ETC.

Mr. HICKS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 4168) for revising and perfecting the classification of letters patent and printed publications in the Patent Office.

The bill was read.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think this bill ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HICKS. I trust my friend will not object. This matter has been considered——

Mr. DOCKERY. This is an old question; it has been up here over and over again. Congress entered on this work ten years ago.

Mr. DALZELL. We sadly need such a classification.

Mr. DOCKERY. I can not consent to the consideration of the bill in this way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON IMPROVEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT COMPANY.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4108) granting to the Washington Improvement and Development Company a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the Washington Improvement and Development Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Washington, and to its assigns, a right of way for its railway, telegraph, and telephone lines through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, beginning at a point on the Columbia River, near the mouth of the Sans Poil River; running thence in a northerly direction to a point in township 37 north, of range 28 east, Willamette meridian; thence northerly to a point near the mouth of Curlew Creek; thence northerly to the international boundary line between British Columbia and the State of Washington; with the right to construct, use, and maintain such branches, spurs, switches, and side tracks as said company may deem necessary for the operation of said railway, together with all the rights granted to railroads by the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads a right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875. Such right of way shall be 50 feet wide on each side of the center line of said railroad, and said company shall have the right to take from the lands adjacent to the line of said road material, stone, earth, and timber necessary for the construction of said railroad; also grounds adjacent to such right of way for station buildings and for necessary side tracks and switch tracks, not to exceed in amount 200 feet in width and 3,000 feet in length for each station, and to an extent not exceeding one station for each 10 miles of road within the limits of said Colville Reservation.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to fix the amount of compensation to be paid to any Indian allottees whose lands may be taken by said company under this act, and to provide the time and manner of payment thereof.

SEC. 3. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located lines through said Colville Reservation to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior; and after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company: Provided, That when a map showing any portion of said railway company's located line is filed herein as provided for, said company shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter or such location shall be void, and said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in sections of 25 miles before the construction of any such section shall be begun.

SEC. 4. That said company is hereby authorized to enter upon said reservation for the purpose of surveying and locating its line of railroad.

SEC. 5. That the right herein granted shall be forfeited by said company unless at least 50 miles of said railroad shall be constructed through the said reservation within three years after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act in whole or in part.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs were read, as follows:

On page 2, in line 15, strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two."

On page 3, in line 16, strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five."

On page 3, line 17, strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. McEWAN. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken on the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McEWAN. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "reservation," in line 18, page 2, insert:

"Provided, however, That no bonds shall be issued for the construction and equipment of the railway, telegraph, and telephone lines provided for herein, in excess of the actual cost of said railway, telegraph, and telephone lines; and all bonds issued in excess of that amount shall be null and void."

Mr. JONES of Washington. With respect to this amendment, let me make this suggestion: The road here contemplated passes only a short distance through the reservation. It commences and ends outside of the reservation. I suppose this amendment is intended to apply to only so much of the road as goes through the reservation.

Mr. McEWAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the amendment be limited in that way, I shall not object.

Mr. McEWAN. I gladly accept the gentleman's suggestion. My only purpose in offering the amendment is to have it operate as a limitation upon the right which this bill proposes to give.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course the rights of the road outside of this reservation would be determined by its charter and by the laws of the State of Washington.

Mr. McEWAN. I cheerfully modify my amendment in accordance with the gentleman's suggestion.

The amendment as modified was read, as follows:

Provided, however, That no bonds shall be issued for the construction and equipment of the railway, telegraph, and telephone lines provided for herein in excess of the actual cost of said railway, telegraph, and telephone lines; and all bonds issued in excess of that amount shall be null and void: And provided further, That the foregoing proviso shall only apply to that part of the railway, telegraph, and telephone lines passing through said reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOHN B. TYRE.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7814) for the relief of John B. Tyre.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay John B. Tyre $113, it being the amount improperly paid on account of expense of the enlistment of Edwin A. Tyre, Company D, Forty-seventh Indiana Volunteers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Reserving the right to object, I would like the gentleman to make some explanation of this bill.

Mr. STEELE. This is a small claim for an amount paid on account of some expense due to the enlistment of the son of the beneficiary in the Forty-seventh Indiana Volunteers. It is to reimburse him for an expenditure on account of that enlistment in 1863.

The report accompanying the bill gives all of the facts in the case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEELE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a request of the House for unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks that I made to-day with reference to the amendments to the labor-organization bill.

There was no objection.

STELLA FRIENDS ACADEMY AND CHURCH ASSOCIATION.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6670) setting apart a certain tract of land in Oklahoma Territory to the Stella Friends Academy and Church Association.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the lawfully constituted authorities of the United States be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent to the Stella Friends Academy and Church Association, of Woods County, Territory of Oklahoma, to the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 24, in township 27 north, of range 11 west, of the Indian meridian, containing 10 acres, more or less, being a tract of land conveyed by Ernest Howard to said Stella Friends Academy and Church Association, by warranty deed dated January 25, 1897.

The Committee on Private Land Claims recommend the adoption of the following proviso:

Provided, That patent shall not be issued until the sum of $10 is paid to the receiver of public moneys of the United States land office at Alva, Okla.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think there should be some explanation of this bill before the House takes final action upon it.

Mr. CALLAHAN. I will state to the gentleman from Maine that under the existing law a homesteader, in proportion to the tract of land he holds, is entitled to certain privileges, by transferring for church, cemetery, or school purposes portions of his land. But the law is so limited that it does not authorize the Commissioner of Public Lands to issue a patent to the grantee, except under certain conditions which are fixed in the law.

A MEMBER. What is the purpose, then, of the pending bill?

Mr. CALLAHAN. The purpose of the bill is to authorize the Commissioner to issue a patent for the extra 10 acres here; and I will make an amendment to the bill covering the point to which I refer; that is, to fix the amount at $15 instead of $10.

The bill carries no appropriation, of course, and involves the Government in no possible expense.

I send to the desk the amendment which I ask to have adopted here.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2 of the proviso, strike out the word "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so it will read: "Until the sum of $15 is paid to the receiver of public moneys," etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CALLAHAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LIFE-SAVING STATION, CHARLEVOIX, MICH.

Mr. MESICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5522) to establish a life-saving station at Charlevoix, Mich.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a life-saving station at Charlevoix, Mich., in such locality as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend.

SEC. 2. That the character of the equipments and appliances of the station, the number of men constituting its crew, and the portion of the year during which it shall be manned, shall be determined by the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. Has this bill been favorably reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. MESICK. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is only an authorization.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is the authorization recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. MESICK. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. Is it unanimously reported by the committee?

Mr. MESICK. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Charlevoix, Mich."

ORANGE MILLS FLATS, FLORIDA.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House concurrent resolution 13, requesting the Secretary of War to report upon the condition, as to navigation, of the St. Johns River in the State of Florida, at the point known as Orange Mills Flats.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War is hereby requested to furnish Congress with information as to the condition of the St. Johns River in the State of Florida, at the point known as Orange Mills Flats, below the city of Palatka, as the river runs, with reference to navigation for ocean-going craft, and what sum of money will probably be required to put said river at that point in condition for navigation for coastwise craft such as usually enter the said river, and whether or not the expenditure necessary for said purpose will be justified by the traffic above said point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to propound a parliamentary inquiry to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOUD. Some days ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] gave notice that he would object to all bills of this character. I voluntarily agreed to object to one-half of them. Now, I objected to the last bill of this character. I do not see the gentleman from Illinois in his seat, and I should like to ask whether I could object on behalf of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and have it charged to him?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain any objection which is made by the gentleman. However, it is a question of conscience as to whether he ought to object or not.

Mr. LOUD. If the objection is made, I should like to have it appear in the RECORD as charged to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw here publicly what objection I may have made heretofore to the request of the gentleman from the State of Texas, unless this objection can be charged in the RECORD against the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not a parliamentary inquiry. [Laughter.] Does the gentleman object?

Mr. LOUD. I shall not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there other objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I desire to have the resolution read. I did not understand it.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

STEAM FOG SIGNAL, MUSKEGON, MICH.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7018) to provide a steam fog signal at the entrance to Muskegon Harbor, in the State of Michigan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Light-House Board is hereby authorized and directed to provide a steam fog whistle at the entrance of Muskegon Harbor, in the State of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask whether this bill has been reported by the committee?

Mr. BISHOP. It has been considered by the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. I notice that no limit of expense is provided.

Mr. BISHOP. There is no appropriation attached to it. The Department said they will erect the fog signal out of the general appropriation.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let it be read again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BENNETT. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have had this under consideration.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why is there no limit to the expense?

Mr. BENNETT. There is no expense in connection with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is out of the general appropriation.

Mr. BENNETT. No appropriation is called for.

Mr. DINGLEY. It takes from the general appropriation?

Mr. MORRIS. It takes from the general appropriation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is there any statement of what the amount is?

Mr. BISHOP. It would be about $4,000 or $4,500.

Mr. DINGLEY. Have you information from the Light-House Board that there will be sufficient in the appropriation?

Mr. BISHOP. Only a personal one. We have their recommendation.

Mr. DINGLEY. I notice there is no appropriation; neither is there any limit to the expense of the matter.

Mr. BISHOP. That is true. They can not make a limitation, because they have no plans at present. They want to erect a steam fog signal and remove the light-house from one place and erect it at the end of the pier.

Mr. DINGLEY. You understand the appropriation already made is sufficient?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Would the gentleman object to an amendment to make the amount not to exceed $4,500?

Mr. BISHOP. That would not be practicable. The light-house that it is proposed to take is a thousand feet from the end of the pier. They propose to take it from where it now is and lift it out to the end of the pier and erect a light-house and steam fog signal in the same place, and they would have to have the matter divided if such an amendment were agreed to. I have conferred with them, and this is entirely satisfactory to the board.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

COMMISSION TO MAKE ALLOTMENTS OF LANDS TO CERTAIN INDIANS.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1833) for the appointment of a commission to make allotments of lands in severalty to Indians upon the Uintah Indian Reservation, in Utah, and to obtain the cession to the United States of all lands within said reservation not so allotted.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is too important a bill to be considered by unanimous consent. It seems to be authorizing a commission with a view to the purchase of land from the Indians, and by and by it will be distributed gratuitously.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

MILLE LAC INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution H. Res. 245.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 245) declaring the lands within the former Mille Lac Indian Reservation, in Minnesota, to be subject to entry under the land laws of the United States.

Resolved, etc., That all public lands formerly within the Mille Lac Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be subject to entry by any bona fide qualified settler under the public land laws of the United States; and all preemption filings heretofore made prior to the repeal of the preemption law by the act of March 3, 1891, and all homestead entries or applications to make entry under the homestead laws, shall be received and treated in all respects as if made upon any of the public lands of the United States subject to preemption or homestead entry: Provided, That lot 4 in section 28, and lots 1 and 2 in section 33, township 43 north, of range 27 west of the fourth principal meridian, be, and the same are hereby, perpetually reserved as a burial place for the Mille Lac Indians, with the right to remove and reinter thereon the bodies of those buried on other portions of said former reservation: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior ascertain and report to Congress at its next session the amount which said Indians are fairly and equitably entitled to for the improvements which they have made on said lands.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask the gentleman if this would deprive the Indians on that reservation of their lands?

Mr. MORRIS. No, sir; the Indians would be removed. They have ceded this reservation to the United States, and they will be removed to the White Earth Reservation, where they will receive their allotments.

Mr. SULZER. Where is that reservation?

Mr. MORRIS. A hundred miles west.

Mr. SULZER. In the same State?

Mr. MORRIS. In the same State.

Mr. SULZER. Is that satisfactory to the Indians?

Mr. MORRIS. I will state that a delegation of these Indians was here in Washington about two weeks ago with their strongest chiefs. This resolution was submitted to them and they expressed their entire satisfaction with it. It was a delegation of the chiefs of this tribe.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does it involve either now or in the future a charge upon the Treasury for this allotment?

Mr. MORRIS. Not necessarily. I will state to the gentleman from Maine what is contemplated by this bill. On this reservation there are several burial places, and these Indians are, as they ought to be, very particular about the burial grounds of their dead. Now, in this resolution there are three 40-acre tracts reserved. There is located on one of these 40-acre tracts the principal burial ground of the Indians, and in addition to this there are two other 40 acres reserved; and hereafter, if their dead are to be removed, they will probably ask the Committee on Indian Affairs to pay the expense of the removal of their dead in the future; but there is no obligation carried in this resolution to make any such payment.

Mr. SULZER. How many Indians are there on this reservation now?

Mr. MORRIS. They vary all the time. All the Indians entitled go on this reservation.

Mr. SULZER. I mean living Indians. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRIS. Between 700 and 800, as I am informed. They wander aimlessly all about on the reservation.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the gentleman what is the meaning of this further proviso:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior ascertain and report to Congress at its next session the amount which said Indians are fairly and equitably entitled to for the improvements which they have made on said lands.

Mr. MORRIS. That was another provision put in there when this bill was accepted by these Indians. It was found that in certain places where the lands were taken up by the settlers that they made some improvements. They desire that they should be paid for these improvements. I will state to the gentleman from Missouri that it was agreed between myself and the attorney of this delegation of Indians that if any gentleman objected to this provision that it should be stricken out. If the gentleman from Missouri objects to that provision, I shall ask that it be stricken out.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why, certainly; it opens the door wide.

Mr. MORRIS. If it is objectionable to the gentleman from Missouri, I move that the last provision be stricken out.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the trouble about this matter of unanimous consent. I do not like to be put in the attitude of objecting to any bill. This seems to be quite an important measure. This proviso is objectionable, and if the bill came up in the regular way I would vote against it.

Mr. MORRIS. If that proviso is objectionable to the gentleman, I will ask that by way of amendment it be stricken out.

Mr. CLARDY. By what committee was the bill reported?

Mr. MORRIS. By the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLARDY. It would seem that the Committee on Indian Affairs ought to have had something to do with it.

Mr. LACEY. This ceased to be an Indian reservation many years ago; but a portion of the Indians still remained there. It is now a part of the public domain.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that the request be submitted with the proposition that the proviso be struck out, as agreed by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill with the proviso stricken out?

Mr. CANNON. I should be glad to ask a question. I see that this bill throws open all public lands within this reservation to settlement under the public-land laws of the United States. I should like to know what lands are thus thrown open. I should also like to know whether in extinguishing the title to these lands the Government of the United States has bought them; and if so, what price was paid, and if anything was paid, whether the lands are not in precisely the same position, so far as legislation is concerned and so far as the equities of the case are concerned, as lands elsewhere in the United States where the Government has extinguished the Indian title by purchase; and whether these lands should not, in accordance with the usual policy, be subject to disposition under the public-land laws on the payment of a stipulated price, whatever it may be—$1.25 or $2.50, according to the price paid by the Government. In other words, are we not proposing in this bill to do by retail what we have refused to do by wholesale in Oklahoma and elsewhere throughout the country?

Mr. MORRIS. These lands are not in the same position as the lands embraced in the other Chippewa reservations in the State of Minnesota, or as lands which have been ceded by the Indians in the Territory of Oklahoma. This reservation originally consisted of about 60,000 acres of land—three and a fraction townships. It was ceded by this band of Indians to the United States Government away back in 1864, and in consideration of that cession the Government reserved to the Indians other lands, among which was a part of the present White Earth Reservation, and it also paid other valuable considerations.

In construing a proviso in that treaty of cession there arose a doubt as to whether this reservation could be properly settled under the public-land laws of the United States, and this has given rise to an irritation between the settlers there and the Indians which has lasted for nearly twenty years.

Of the 60,000 acres embraced in this reservation, all but about 5,000 have already been entered, settled upon, or patented by the Government to people who have either located additional homestead scrip upon it or have settled upon it under the homestead, or preemption laws. These men have gone upon the land, presuming that the same course would be pursued in reference to the remaining land as had been pursued in reference to that already patented.

But owing to rulings of the Interior Department, which have been one year one way and another year another way, which have held one year that the land was open to entry under the public-land laws, and another year that it was not thus open, these men have been hanging between heaven and earth until now this resolution has been presented for the purpose of clearing up the whole atmosphere. Steps will then be taken to get these Indians to remove to the White Earth Reservation, where they can receive their allotments. As it is now, the Indians on this reservation have no public schools, no farmer, no agent; nothing that the other Indians have. It will be greatly to the advantage of these Indians if they go to the White Earth Reservation, where they will have these various facilities.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman will allow me to read two lines from the letter of Secretary Bliss which answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]:

It further appears that these lands do not come under either of the two classes of lands referred to in my letter of the 5th instant with reference to what is known as the "free-home bill;" and hence the passage of such a bill as I have suggested would not conflict with the opinions expressed in my letter of that date nor with the policy therein recommended.

Mr. MORRIS. I introduced this resolution and also a bill tending in the same direction; and at my request both the bill and resolution were referred to the Secretary of the Interior, and by him to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. In this report is printed a letter from each of these officials recommending the passage of this resolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word concerning this measure, because it came before the Committee on Public Lands, of which I am a member. Allow me to remark that the lands to which this bill applies do not come under the operation of the general provision embraced in the Indian appropriation bill undertaking to open to homestead entry the Indian reservations. This reservation has been held by one Secretary of the Interior to be open to homestead entry, and by a succeeding Secretary of the Interior to be not open to such entry.

Senator TELLER, when Secretary of the Interior, held that these lands were open to entry, and afterwards were declared not open to entry by Secretary Noble. Homestead entries made in good faith by people under the conflicting decisions, however, ought to be recognized as valid locations. I believe for my own part that all public lands ought to be open to homestead entries. But if we can not open all we ought to open at least a part of them, and this part is especially entitled to the homestead law.

This matter has been considered and unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands. I hope there will be no objection to its present consideration or its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was considered.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Mr. Speaker, in compliance with the agreement made with the gentleman from Missouri, I move the amendment I send to the desk—that is, by striking out all after the word "reservation" in line 7 of page 2 after the period in that line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NANCY SUSAN THOMPSON.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 887, being a bill for the relief of Nancy Susan Thompson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Nancy Susan Thompson, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $166.31, being the amount due her father, Archibald Thompson (of whom she is the sole heir), appearing on the books of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what this bill proposes exactly, and what the report provides in the case?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Has this bill been reported by a committee?

Mr. OTEY. Yes; it has been reported by the Committee on Claims.

I think perhaps the reading of the report will explain the bill fully to the gentleman from California. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. MINOR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, having had under consideration House bill 887, respectfully report:

Your committee has considered the claim of Nancy Susan Thompson, and find that the service was rendered by her father and the amount is to his credit on the books of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department. The letter from the Treasury Department attached hereto is conclusive that the claim is a just one and should be paid, and your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, this report is entirely unsatisfactory, and unless there be some further explanation of the matter I think the bill ought not to be passed in this way.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, there is a letter appended to the report, which was not read, and which, I think, will explain the circumstances of the case better than I can do. I ask that this letter be read.

The letter referred to by Mr. OTEY was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
AUDITOR FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1896.

SIR: Your letter of the 25th instant, relative to the claim of Archibald Thompson for carrying the mail on certain routes in Virginia at the beginning of the late war, has been received by reference from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. In reply I have the honor to inform you that the records of this office show that Mr. Thompson was mail contractor on route No. 4324, Christiansburg to Newport, and route No. 4327, Blacksburg to Shellville, in the State of Virginia, from July 1, 1859; that he was paid in full to December 31, 1861, and that a balance stands to his credit for service from January 1 to May 31, 1861, the date to which service has been certified, amounting to $166.31.

The Confederate register of individual payments made by the Confederate States government on account of mail service and for other purposes, now in the custody of this office, is somewhat incomplete, there being a number of leaves and parts of leaves missing, but as far as the record goes there is no evidence that any payment was made to Mr. Thompson by the Confederate States government on account of his contract with the United States.

Very respectfully,

GEO. A. HOWARD, Auditor.

Hon. PETER J. OTEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think, under the circumstances, that that bill ought to be passed by the House. A portion of that claim covers a period of time when the State of Virginia was substantially in rebellion against the Government——

Mr. OTEY. Oh, no; you are mistaken.

Mr. LOUD. Well, it runs back to 1861. The gentleman can place such construction as he pleases upon it. When did they appear in rebellion, I would ask the gentleman?

Mr. OTEY. Well, the gentleman from California knows as well as I do.

Mr. LOUD. The bill covers a period of time when the war was proceeding.

Mr. OTEY. If the gentleman will permit me, this claim has been adjudicated by the Department. It has been considered, and the amount found to be due, although the gentleman from California seems to be ignorant of the fact that the bill was adjusted by that Department with which he has had so much to do—the Post-Office Department. It is a part of the report that the money is due and is placed to the credit of the party, and has been since the work was performed; but it can not be paid out without a special act of Congress.

Mr. LOUD. There is nothing whatever in the bill, or in the report, as far as I have understood the reading of it, which explains or justifies the payment of the claim. That is the point I am making.

Mr. OTEY. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the report be again read. The gentleman certainly did not understand the reading of it.

The report, there being no objection, was again read.

Mr. LOUD. Now, it says that these services were performed. Where and when were they performed?

Mr. OTEY. If the gentleman will observe the reading of the letter appended to the report, it will show the facts fully. If he will allow me, I will call his attention to that portion of the letter which says that—

I have the honor to inform you that the records of this office show that Mr. Thompson was the mail contractor on route No. 4324, from Christiansburg to Newport, and route No. 4327, from Blacksburg to Shellville, in the State of Virginia, from July 1, 1859—

And the gentleman will observe that this was before the war, and that he was paid in full to December 31, 1861. But a balance stands to his credit for services from January 1 to May 31, 1861, the date to which service has been certified, amounting in all to $166.31.

Now, the bill in question simply allows the claimant to receive the compensation which was due to her father for the services rendered by him to the Department, and which sum appears to his credit on the books of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BRUCKER. This is the original amount without interest.

Mr. OTEY. Of course. No interest is allowed. The Government does not pay interest.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman why this party did not make claim at the time? Was he busily engaged somewhere else?

Mr. OTEY. I can only say that there were thousands of people who did not know that they could make claim, and the gentleman from California is as well aware of this fact as I am.

Mr. LOUD. This gentleman evidently knew he could make claim, because he had made claims for all of his pay up to the 31st of December. He evidently was familiar with the routine by which he should proceed in order to get his money. Is it not a matter of fact that this gentleman was at that time probably very busily engaged in an endeavor to destroy this Government and did not think it particularly safe to present his claim at Washington, where he knew it could be paid?

Mr. OTEY. If that was so, there is no reason why he should not present it now.

Mr. LOUD. I think I shall have to object.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from California both that these claims have not been paid for the last fifteen or twenty years. There was a bill to pay several hundred thousand dollars of them; and on its consideration in the House, the bill was under the charge of the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Reagan. On its consideration, Mr. Willetts, a Representative from Michigan, objected to it, and the question was raised as to whether any of these claims had ever been paid by the Confederate government, and the records were brought as to some of them.

Now, these claims come and are referred sometimes to the Committee on Appropriations at almost every session, and so far as that committee are concerned, and so far as the House are concerned, I think I can state that this class of claims have not been paid. This is only one of several hundred thousand dollars' worth of claims that are substantially on all fours. I do not care anything about the amount involved; but one gentleman ought not to be favored unless all are; and unless you come to the standpoint of public policy of paying them all, it seems to me it ought not to be done by piecemeal.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. OTEY. Who objected?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California objected.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3684) for the relief of Joseph Touisant, alias Touzan; and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CLAYTON was allowed five days from this date in which to print in the RECORD his remarks on the bill H. R. 10100.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. R. 86) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the succession to the Presidency in certain cases; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 924) to authorize the Washington and Glen Echo Railroad Company to obtain a right of way and construct tracks into the District of Columbia 600 feet.

GEORGE BARNES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3663) granting a pension to George Barnes and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before action is taken on this bill I desire to make a single observation. I presume I am not violating the rules of the Senate when I call attention to a remark made in the House of Representatives a few days ago in reference to the private pension bills on which conferences have been asked by the House of Representatives. In considering one of those bills, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House, being interrogated as to why the Senate reduced the rate in some of them, made this observation:

> Oh, I will say that because the House would not give an extravagantly large pension to the widow of a brigadier-general, they retaliate here in a few cases by cutting down the pension that is voted to a private soldier or to an imbecile child. We will try to settle that.

Mr. President, I simply want to say that in reducing the rates in some of these House bills the Committee on Pensions of the Senate had no purpose whatever of retaliation, the action being taken on what seemed to be good and substantial grounds. One of these bills proposes to increase the pension of a soldier from $8 to $50 a month, $8 being all that he can get in the Pension Bureau, and the committee, in their discretion and judgment, make a reduction in that bill to $30 a month. What is true of that bill is likewise true of other bills. It was simply done for the purpose of trying to keep the matter of special pension legislation within reasonable bounds.

Mr. President, I wish further, for the information of the Senate, to state that the Senate bill to which reference was made in the House is the bill granting a pension to the widow of the late Brig. Gen. John D. Stevenson, in which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is very greatly interested. The Senate passed that bill at $50 a month. The House cut it down to $30 a month. We had a conference, and the House insists upon keeping the rate at $30 a month in that bill, and we have been compelled to agree to it.

The House conferees say to us that they have adopted a rule, which they do not propose to violate, that where the widow of a general can not obtain a pension in the Bureau, they will not allow the pension at a rate of over $30 a month, no matter how distinguished the soldier may have been, but they will agree to pension the widows of general officers to the extent of $50 a month, if it is an increase over the regular Bureau pension of $30 per month, when the circumstances seem to warrant such increase.

I mention this for the purpose of notifying Senators that it is utterly futile to introduce these bills at seventy-five and one hundred dollars a month, and then urge upon the Committee on Pensions and the Senate that they should be passed at that amount.

Mr. President, I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendment to the pending bill, granting a pension to George Barnes, and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PRITCHARD, and Mr. ROACH were appointed.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Pennsylvania has kindly suggested that he would yield that I might ask unanimous consent to call up the remaining bills on the Private Pension Calendar, seven in number. I ask consent for their consideration now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of certain pension bills indicated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the first bill on the Private Pension Calendar will be stated.

Mr. GALLINGER. At the request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], two adverse reports went on the Calendar, one the bill (S. 1746) granting a pension to Margaret Butler Meade and Henrietta Meade, daughters of the late Maj. Gen. George Gordon Meade, United States Army, and the other a bill (S. 3542) granting a pension to Maj. Moses Chapman. I ask the Senator if he has any objection to action being taken on those bills?

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection to action being taken on those bills. There is one bill, however, that has been reported adversely which I want to bring up for the consideration of the Senate at the proper time. It is the bill fixing the minimum of pension at $10 a month.

Mr. GALLINGER. That bill is on the general Calendar, not on the Private Pension Calendar.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like at some time to have that bill taken up.

DAUGHTERS OF THE LATE MAJOR-GENERAL MEADE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is an adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed in the absence of objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Last week some Senator asked that it should remain on the Calendar, and I would prefer that it should remain on the Calendar for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

Valentine, of Company A, Ninety-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

MARY ABERCROMBIE SHUFELDT.

Mr. GALLINGER. The next bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. 1995) granting a pension to Mary Abercrombie Shufeldt, which was reported adversely. Let it remain on the Calendar.

ARBITRATION BETWEEN RAILWAY COMPANIES AND EMPLOYEES.

The bill (H. R. 4372) concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut subsequently said: The bill (H. R. 4372) concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees, known as the arbitration bill, was referred a while ago to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I understand that the Senate bill on the same subject has been made a special order for Monday next. I do not know whether, under those circumstances, the chairman of the committee desires to have the bill referred.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the reference will be reconsidered, and that the bill will be laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the reference of the bill referred to will be reconsidered, and the bill will lie on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the Post-Office appropriation bill be now proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9008) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. PETTIGREW.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], introduced yesterday evening, be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 6, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1898, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 20 per cent per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight heretofore fixed and allowed by law.

Mr. QUAY. I desire also that the section of the bill providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the expenses of the Post-Office Department be read to the Senate. I merely ask for the reading. It has already been adopted.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 5. That a joint committee consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House, and in addition the two chairmen of the Committees on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, shall be appointed by the Senate and House to investigate, during the coming recess of Congress, the question whether or not excessive prices are paid to the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails and as compensation for postal-car service, and all sources of revenue and all expenditures of the postal service, and rates of postage upon all postal matter, the expenses of said joint committee to be paid, one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers to be approved by the two chairmen.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, it will be seen that taken in connection with the section just read the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is in a manner lynch-law legislation. It condemns and executes the culprit and afterwards impanels a jury in the shape of this commission to try whether he was guilty.

I do not intend to discuss the question raised by the Senator from South Dakota, but in order that the Senate may understand exactly what has transpired upon this question in the Committee on Appropriations, I will make a brief statement and ask for the reading of certain papers.

The Senate will remember that there was a somewhat acrimonious discussion upon this question in the last Congress, in which I believe the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], and probably the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], took part. In view of what then transpired, all the expenditures of the Post-Office Department being in a nebulous condition, little understood by Congress or by the country, it was thought proper by the Committee on Appropriations that the suggestion, I believe, of the Senator from New Hampshire, made at the last Congress, should be adopted, to wit, that a commission should be appointed to investigate and report upon all the expenditures of the Post-Office Department.

As to the immediate question of the justice of the rate charged by the railroad companies, the committee thought proper to proceed for the time being with an investigation of its own. Accordingly there were called before the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee in charge of this bill the officers of the following railway lines: The Missouri, Kansas and Texas, the Maine Central, the Boston and Maine, the Boston and Albany, the Louisville and Nashville, the Northern Pacific, the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Memphis, the St. Louis and San Francisco, the Missouri Pacific, the Southern Railway, and some eight or ten other railway companies, the names of which escape my recollection just now.

They were examined upon the question of the justice of the rate paid by the Government to them for the transportation of mails and upon the relation which the rate for mail service bore to the express, passenger, and freight service. They were examined at much length and testified fairly, I think, to the satisfaction of the entire committee; and the consensus of opinion in the committee, unless disputed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], was that the Government received a better and a cheaper service from the railroad companies in the transportation of the mails than do passengers or shippers of freight or express companies.

In this connection, I do not desire to occupy time further than to state the conclusion, because I wish to have the statements of these gentlemen read to the Senate. In connection with the railway branch of the investigation, I will ask that the statement of Mr. Knott, the vice-president of the Louisville and Nashville, which is very clear and very compact, shall be read by the Secretary. I do not suppose it is necessary for me to read it myself. I am not feeling well this morning, and I do not desire to do so. It is on page 62 of the report of this committee. As a matter of course, this statement has been printed in the report, but I think it desirable, for the information of the country, that it should go out to the country with the political diatribes which are likely to follow my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the statement will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE LOUISVILLE AND NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

COMPENSATION FOR RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 19, 1898.

To the honorable Subcommittee on Post-Offices of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

GENTLEMEN: It is, I think, a duty which the railroads owe to themselves, to the public, and to the members of this committee, to submit the facts as to the compensation received by them for carrying the mails, not thereby only to refute the unsubstantiated statements as to what the roads are receiving for that transportation, but to lay before you such figures as will enable you to reach a conclusion upon the issue, whether what the railroads are receiving (although materially less than they are alleged to receive) is or is not excessive.

While it is important to all to relieve the public mind of the erroneous impression which has been so industriously disseminated as to the alleged excessive "charges" by the railroads for this public service, yet the controlling consideration at the present time is whether the Government is paying an undue or unreasonable price for the service secured.

It is improper to speak of the railroads charging the Government for the transportation of mail. The railroads have been receiving or accepting the rates fixed from time to time by the Appropriation Committee. They have had no voice in fixing their compensation, in the first place, nor are they in position to exercise any discretion as to the amount of mails to be transported, the amount to be transported on any one route, or the establishment of any particular routes. The kind or character of mails to be transported by any railroad, and weight thereof, between any two designated points on any particular train is at the option of the Government officials. The construction, maintenance, and equipment of railway post-office cars is in accordance with Government regulations.

One of the most misleading factors in the discussion of the railroads' compensation is the attempted comparison between what the railroads are charged with receiving from the Government for the transportation of mails and what the railroads charge the public for "similar services." It is hardly necessary to suggest to the members of this committee that there are no "similar services" performed by the railroads for others. Between the service rendered by the railroads in handling mails and that rendered to shippers of freight or to express companies in the handling of express matter there is no substantial basis of comparison.

There are probably more apparent points of comparison between the express service and the mail service than between any other, but even here there are only a few common factors.

To relieve our minds of the erroneous impression that there is some common standard by which the express service and the mail service may be measured, we have only to consider the fact that much of the express service is in fact simply the expeditious movement of perishable freights, being solid carloads of fruits or vegetables, sometimes solid through carloads of fine stock, and not infrequently solid carloads of merchandise. (In referring to carloads I mean not the bulk of space occupied, but the paying weight of the freight with which the express cars are loaded.)

It is impossible to compare the transportation of mail matter, consisting, as to number and importance of the service rendered, mostly of letters weighing less than half an ounce each, with express packages of boots, shoes, hats and caps, millinery, and other high-class merchandise largely distributed by express, much less with the transportation of carloads of racing stock or carloads of grapes, peaches, etc., of early vegetables, aggregating in weight 10,000 to 20,000 pounds to the car, and paid for accordingly.

Express cars are not specially fitted up by the railroads for the express companies, as are post-office cars or post-office compartments.

Express cars can be used on any portion of the line where traffic is offering. On the Louisville and Nashville road the same express car can be used between Cincinnati and Nashville at one time and between Montgomery and New Orleans another time. This can not be done with post-office cars. They have to be used on the route to which they are assigned, and if for any reason a car assigned to the route between Nashville and Cincinnati becomes disabled or unfit for service, the railroad company can not transfer part of the extra equipment prepared for the line south of Nashville. It must keep on hand extra cars on each particular route to meet such emergencies.

Again, it is apparent that weight can not be taken as a controlling factor in fixing the pay for the transportation of mails, as the Government requires for the expeditious distribution of the mails, to meet the proper demands of the public, cars the pay for which so far as weight of car and carrying capacity are concerned is in no way commensurate. While railway post-office cars are capable of carrying 40,000 pounds in paying weight, the actual weight of mails distributed therein may not exceed 1 or 2 tons, and in many cases not over 5,000 pounds.

The impracticability of using the weight of mails transported as the only or even the controlling factor in fixing the reasonableness of the average pay will be apparent when I mention that the weight transported on the different mail routes on the Louisville and Nashville road varies from an average weight per day on one route of 73 pounds to an average weight per day on another route of 28,000 pounds, the proportion being about as 1 to 400.

It is not, however, inappropriate perhaps to attempt some comparison as to the relative compensation received for the transportation of passengers with that received for the transportation of mail, both being hauled on the same trains.

In the annual report of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company it is shown that the gross earnings from the transportation of passengers and the gross earnings from the transportation of mail, and the operating expenses severally chargeable thereto, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1897, were as follows:

Gross earnings:
Passenger		$4,304,769.88
Mail		$999,269.55
Gross earnings per car mile:
Passenger	cents..	20.08
Mail	do....	18.79
Operating expenses:
Passenger		$2,965,129.07
Mail		$515,120.39
Operating expenses per car mile:
Passenger	cents..	13.83
Mail	do....	13.88
Net earnings per car mile:
Passenger	do....	6.25

It will be seen from this table that the gross earnings per car mile from the transportation of mail was 18.79 cents.

The average earnings per ton per mile in the same fiscal year for the transportation of all classes of freight, including coal, lumber, pig iron, iron ore, grain, and food products, as well as merchandise, was practically eight-tenths of a cent. Now, assuming for railway post-office cars a carrying capacity of 20 tons per car, or less than the carrying capacity of the company's standard freight cars, the average earnings per car mile, if paid for at the average rate of all classes of freights, high and low, if the company had been allowed to control the loading of the postal matter, would have been 16 cents, or within a fraction of what was actually earned from the transportation of mails in passenger trains, run at a high rate of speed, and in many cases the schedules of which are specially adopted to meet the needs or requirements of the Post-Office Department.

The operating expenses, as divided between "passenger" and "mails," are arrived at by taking the total operating expenses chargeable against "passenger-train earnings" and dividing same on the basis of car mileage. The "passenger expenses" were charged with the total mileage of all coaches, parlor and sleeping cars, together with the total mileage of all baggage cars and one-third of the mileage of "combination" baggage, mail, and express cars.

The "expenses of conducting mail" were arrived at in like manner by charging to that account the total mileage of the railway post-office cars and one-third of the mileage of the "combination" baggage, postal, and express cars. This is clearly not an unfair basis of division, so far as the transportation of mail is concerned, when we bear in mind that the postal cars are more expensive both to construct and maintain and to operate than the ordinary baggage or express cars; and same is true with regard to the postal apartment in the combination baggage, mail, and express cars—i. e., such apartments are provided with special facilities for the handling of mails not provided or required in the express or baggage apartments.

It may be well to note here that the company is called upon to furnish room in its baggage cars for the handling of closed or locked-pouch mail, not to be distributed en route. No proportion, however, of the mileage of baggage or express cars in which such pouches may be carried has in the above calculation been charged against the transportation of mails.

I think it is proper to suggest that the railroads have the right to expect the Government to pay them at least as much for the use of their passenger trains, in proportion to the labor performed and the services rendered, as the public using the same trains pay. But the company's statistics show that the Louisville and Nashville Company secured for the year ended June 30, 1897, net earnings per car mile for the transportation of passengers, after the payment of operating expenses—not including interest and taxes—6.23 cents, while from the mail they only secured 4.90 cents, a difference of over 25 per cent in favor of the passenger account.

For the purpose of checking this comparison I have caused to be compiled a statement of the gross weight hauled 1 mile in passenger cars and in mail cars. By "gross weight" I mean not only the total paying weight, but the weight of the cars in which the passengers and mails were respectively transported, charging the passenger transportation with the weight of the baggage cars and the baggage therein. And from this it is ascertained that for the year ended June 30, 1897, the earnings per ton per mile for "paying" and "dead" weight hauled in passenger trains were:

	Cent.
Passengers	0.6854
Mail	0.6101

The expenses per ton per mile, again using the same gross weight, were:

	Cent.
Passengers	0.4735
Mail	0.4222

Leaving net earnings, not including interest and taxes:

	Cent.
Passengers, per gross ton carried	0.2129
Mail, per gross ton carried	0.1379

A difference of over 50 per cent in favor of the passenger account.

While the average rate per ton per mile can not be taken as the proper standard by which to judge of the reasonableness of the compensation received by the railroads for the transportation of the mails, yet as a partial answer to the gross misrepresentation so often indulged in with regard to the average compensation received by the railroads for such service, I have undertaken to make an estimate on that basis with respect to the service performed by the Louisville and Nashville company, based on the weights of the mails carried over each of the routes designated by the post-office authorities for the Louisville and Nashville lines.

There were carried, according to the last annual report, 5,451,241 tons of mail 1 mile, and the total pay for carriage of mails averaged 11.3 cents per ton per mile. This average, you will please bear in mind, is made up of the service over more than 3,000 miles of road, including the main line and branches, varying from branch lines 8 to 10 miles long, with light traffic, to the long routes, with relatively heavy traffic, the average weight carried on the different routes varying from 73 pounds daily to 28,452 pounds daily.

This average rate of 11.3 cents per ton per mile represents a little over one-half a cent per 100 pounds per mile, or for an average distance of 10 miles 5.6 cents per 100 pounds.

As compared with this, the local Louisville and Nashville tariff provides the following charges for distances of 10 miles or less on the first six classes of freight, in cents per 100 pounds:

	Cents.
Class 1	13
Class 2	10
Class 3	9
Class 4	8
Class 5	7
Class 6	6

The Illinois railroad and warehouse commission has established, by the authority vested in it, what it deems reasonable maximum charges for the transportation of freights between points in the State of Illinois, and that tariff authorizes railroads in that State to charge for freights 10 miles and not under 6 miles, in cents per 100 pounds:

	Cents.
Class 1	15
Class 2	13
Class 3	11
Class 4	9
Class 6	6

The Georgia railroad commission is also empowered to establish rates in the State of Georgia, and its tariff of reasonable maximum rates provides the following for 10 miles and not under 5 miles, in cents per 100 pounds:

	Cents.
Class 1	16
Class 2	14
Class 3	13
Class 4	10

While, as above shown, the rate paid the Louisville and Nashville road for the transportation of mails averages for 10 miles 5.6 cents per 100 pounds.

As illustrative of the varying conditions under which the transportation of mails is accomplished, I beg to submit the following condensed statement of the postal services rendered on the various routes as designated by the Department officials on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company's lines:

On these 26 routes, aggregating 972 miles, it is safe to assume at least one post-office for every 5 miles, so that on that portion of the line the railroad company is enabling the Government to receive and deliver mails at 194 post-offices. On these routes it is found that there is an average of 3.32 trips per day. Assuming that there is only one mail package received and one delivered each trip, we have an aggregate of 1,298 separate packages handled daily, for which the Government pays for the transportation over 972 miles of route $190.84 per day, or approximately 1⅝ cents for each package.

This payment, it must be borne in mind, is made for service on routes where the governing consideration is not the weight of mails carried, but the facilities secured, for of the 26 routes considered 6 of them handled less than 200 pounds daily (one of them only 73 pounds), 18 handled more than 200 pounds, but less than 1,000 pounds, and only 2 of the routes handled more than 1,000 pounds per day.

On routes where the weight aggregates such a figure as to allow the minimum compensation per mile provision to be eliminated and the Government uses the weight as basis of pay, calculations may be made to show, with some degree of accuracy and some correctness of conclusion, the compensation received per ton per mile or per car for the mail matter carried.

The postal route, which on the Louisville and Nashville carries the heaviest weight of mail per day, is the line between Cincinnati and Nashville, a distance of 298.63 miles. The weight carried on this route per day, according to the Government weighing in February, 1896, on which weight settlement is now being made, was 28,452 pounds, or 14.23 tons, aggregating 4,246 tons carried 1 mile per day.

To handle this 14 tons of mail per day the railroad is required to make four trips per day each way between Cincinnati and Nashville, and to furnish two railway post-office cars 60 feet long, weighing 80,000 pounds each, and two railway post-office cars 50 feet long, weighing 65,000 pounds each; the average dead weight for the railway post-office cars therefore being 77,000 pounds. In addition to this, on the other trains per day, to make up the four round trips per day, railway post-office compartments are furnished.

If the railroad were allowed to consolidate the mail offering for transportation into the four post-office cars, even then the average paying weight per car would only be 3½ tons, or 7,000 pounds, while the dead weight transported would be 77,000 pounds, or in the proportion of 11 to 1 to the paying weight.

The carrying capacity of these cars, constructed in accordance with the Government regulations, is not less than 40,000 pounds. The railroad company's tariff rates for the transportation of freights of the first class, such as dry goods, boots and shoes, clothing, etc., from Cincinnati to Nashville is 53 cents per 100 pounds, and if loaded as in the case of freights offering for transportation, one car each way would more than answer for the service, and the average loading would be 14,000 pounds. The revenue at 53 cents per 100 pounds would be $74.20 per car, while the aggregate revenue obtained from the transportation of the mail, not charging anything for the service rendered by the railroad in furnishing the postal "compartment" cars, and including the compensation paid for the transportation of the post-office cars, Cincinnati to Nashville, averages only $52.26 per car. It is shown, therefore, that the compensation paid by the Government is less than the railroad company would charge others for similar service, so far as there is any similarity of service.

It should be borne in mind that the mails are dispatched on the fastest passenger trains, the Government reserving the right of designating transportation on such trains, with no option on the part of the railroad company, while first-class freights would be transported on freight trains at the railroad company's option in cars very much lighter in weight and very much less expensive to construct and operate.

There is nothing more misleading than a comparison of charges received, or alleged to be received, for services radically dissimilar, making deductions from such comparisons upon which to base charges of extortion or discrimination.

We hear references to the revenue received or charges made for the transportation of express matter, as though that furnished a proper standard for measuring the reasonableness of the compensation paid by the Government for the transportation of the mails. I have mentioned the substantial dissimilarity between the two kinds of service, and this will be emphasized by reference to the tariffs of freight and classification governing same issued by the different express companies.

The business of the express companies is not confined to, and, in fact, does not consist principally of, the transportation of matter which goes to make up the Government mails. Their tariffs are practically merchandise tariffs, and the rates are termed "merchandise rates." While, therefore, the express company does provide rates for the handling of newspapers, books, and periodicals, it is a mere incident of their business, which consists largely of the handling of large quantities of all kinds of miscellaneous merchandise, from bird cages and live birds to wall paper and woolen goods.

Another much-vaunted criticism against the Government for allowing, and the railroads for receiving, the present rates for the transportation of mails is based upon the alleged fact that there has been no reduction in the rates paid for the transportation of mail as compared with the marked reductions in the average freight charges in all sections of the country.

This criticism is based upon a misstatement of fact in the first instance and upon a misapprehension of the conditions in the second instance, the misstatement of fact being that there has been no reduction by the Government in the compensation to the railroads, when this committee knows that such reductions have been made, which now aggregate 15 per cent under the charges formerly fixed by the Government officials, and on "land-grant" roads 20 per cent additional reduction, and that the average pay for the transportation of mails, so far as it is governed by weight, decreases from year to year as the tonnage of mails increases.

Mr. QUAY. I ask leave that the balance of the statement of Mr. Knott, including page 77, be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that request will be complied with.

The remainder of the statement of Mr. Knott is as follows:

The present law in its operation with the continued increase in the weight of mails results in continuous decrease in the average pay. While the law authorizes the payment as a minimum of $42.75 per mile per annum for 200 pounds, yet after a weight of 3,000 per day on any route has been reached the allowance for each additional 2,000 pounds is only $21.37 per mile per annum; or for ten times the weight one-half the allowance, so that for 2,000 pounds carried over any route after that aggregate weight is reached the compensation is only one-twentieth as much per unit as where only 200 pounds is carried. This is the application of decrease in compensation with increase in weight of the so-called "carload principle" with a vengeance. While, however, the railroad company for the additional weight gets only one-twentieth of the pay per unit of minimum pay for each pound of mail matter added, the Government charges and receives the same pay for each pound of matter carried; the same compensation for the last 2,000 pounds as for the first 200 pounds forwarded by it over any route.

With regard to the other charge—as to the misapprehension of the facts—no one would be more ready than I to credit the railroads of this country with all that has been done by them in the commercial development of the country through the proper adjustment of their freight charges, which has brought forth results not obtained in any other country or in any other period of the world's history.

The railroads of the United States furnish better freight facilities, more rapid service, and more reliable service, at lower average freight rates for the service so performed, than those of any other country, and these average charges are, it is true, showing marked decreases from year to year.

Now, any attempt to compare charges for mail services with freight services should be addressed more particularly to the freight charges for short hauls, as mails are distributed every few miles. And we should ascertain whether or not the charges on what we term the merchandise classes have shared in the reduction of the average freight charges with which we are so familiar.

As a matter of fact, the reductions in the average freight rates made by the railroads of the United States have been brought about by the increase in the long-haul and low-grade traffic; distribution of the products of one section in all other sections; the increase in the transportation of food products, moving grain, wheat, and live stock from the West, not only for consumption in the United States, but throughout the markets of the world; increase in the production and movement of coal, cheapening the transportation cost of coal, ores, and coke, and the consequent cheapening of the production of pig iron and all articles of iron manufacture, so that the American metal products, particularly iron and steel articles, are now being sold and shipped daily to different markets in Europe, Asia, and Africa.

While this has been going on—and it could only have been accomplished through the active cooperation of the railroads—the marked decrease in the average freight rates has not been made, and could not under any conditions have been made, to apply in the transportation of articles of merchandise covered by the higher classes, usually designated as classes 1, 2, 3, 4, etc., in the freight classification, articles which go to make up an important revenue for the railroads, but furnish, on account of their light weight as related to bulk, a very small percentage of the tonnage, and the value of which is not in any material degree affected by the charges made for the transportation thereof from one section to another. That there have been decreases in the rates for the transportation of these articles is true, but that there have been marked and radical decreases in those rates by the railroads while continuing to urge upon Congress the injustice of making a reduction in the pay allowed for the transportation of mail is not true.

To illustrate what I have said, I beg to submit some figures showing the rates charged for the transportation of the higher classes of goods in different sections of the country at different times during a part of ten years between 1882 and 1892. For instance, the rates from New York to Chicago have been as follows:

Year.	Class—
	1.	2.	3.

(The slightly higher charges apparent here now as compared with ten years ago is due to change in method of classifying freights and rearrangement of tariff schedules. There was no actual increase.)

These rates may be taken as indicative of the trend of rates on the classes shown in territory between the Eastern seaboard and the Mississippi River; the rates from New York to Chicago being fixed, the rates to other important Western points are correspondingly adjusted.

With respect to the rates west of Chicago and west of the Mississippi River, I submit for consideration the following comparison, taking the rates shown in cents per 100 pounds from Chicago and St. Louis, respectively, to Missouri River points, Kansas City, Atchison, Leavenworth, St. Joseph, etc.:

From—	Class 1.		Class 2.		Class 3.

Chicago	90	75	75	60	50	42
St. Louis	70	55	55	40	40	32

In Southern territory the rates from the principal Western points distributing into the South, taking the rates to Atlanta as a representative point, have been reduced from time to time as shown by the following comparative figures:

Rates per 100 pounds.

Louisville	1.18	1.07	1.02	.92	.88	.81
Cincinnati	1.18	1.07	1.02	.92	.88	.81

The transcontinental rates—that is, the rates to San Francisco and other principal Pacific coast points, on the higher grades—may be compared as follows:

Rates per 100 pounds.

From—	Dry goods.		Cotton piece goods.		Furniture.
	1882.	1892.	1882.	1892.	1882.	1892.

The rates which I have just referred to are long-distance hauls between large and important commercial centers, on high-class merchandise.

As further evidence, however, in support of our statement with respect to the conditions which control the rates on merchandise classes, I venture to submit extracts from the local tariffs of roads both in the eastern and western portions of the country:

It has been frequently urged that the pay for the transportation of railway post-office cars is also excessive, and the proposition is pending that the Government itself should own its post-office cars and require the railroads to haul them at charges not exceeding what they would charge others for similar service. This proposition is impracticable, because there is no similar service performed for anyone else by the railroads.

Let us take for illustration again the route between Cincinnati and Nashville, because that is, as stated, the route over which the heaviest mails are transported by the Louisville and Nashville Company, for which the railroad company receives the largest aggregate compensation, while the Government secures the service for the smallest rate per ton, or per unit of service rendered.

The railway post-office cars, constructed according to Government regulations, as stated, weigh (the 60-foot cars) 89,000 pounds. The present average cost is $5,700. To fill the line, running two cars each way daily, requires, on the average, not less than five cars for the service, representing an investment of $28,500. The mileage of postal cars on this route aggregates 435,900 miles annually.

The usual and ordinary charge for carrying a mail car as freight on its own wheels in freight trains is 10 cents per mile. Had these cars been offered for transportation as freight, the revenue would have amounted to $43,595. The compensation allowed by the Government for the transportation of the cars, in addition to the transportation of the mail, was—

Total	26,870.70

The 60-foot railway post-office cars constructed in accordance with Government requirements weigh 89,000 pounds, or 44½ tons. The allowance by the Government for the transportation of these cars is $50 per mile of route per annum. As the cars are required to make a round trip per day, the allowance, it will be observed, is only $25 per mile of service and the compensation amounts to only 1½ mills per ton per mile of the car weight for the movement of the car. In the report submitted by the Hon. J. H. Mitchell, subcommittee of the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard of the United States Senate, in 1874, after an exhaustive investigation into the proper allowance for the transportation of railway post-office cars, the conclusion was reached that 7½ mills per ton per mile of the car weight as compensation would about represent the cost and a fair average amount of net income over the cost of service on railroads in the United States.

In compliance with the demands of the Government officials, the length of the cars has been increased from time to time from 30 feet, as it was then, until it is now 60 feet, and the weight per car has increased correspondingly until, as stated, the traveling post-offices weigh 44½ tons. The compensation paid at the present rate is only one-fifth of what the Senate committee found twenty years ago to have been a fair allowance.

In addition to transporting the cars, the railroad carries all the mail clerks necessary for distribution of the mails en route free. In case of accident, resulting in injury or loss of life to the Government employee while on the cars engaged in Government service, the railroad and not the Government becomes responsible, and the railroad and not the Government is held for any damages that may be assessed.

The railroad furnishes refrigerator cars to shippers for the transportation of fruits and vegetables, dressed meats, and other perishable articles. It does not, however, transport two or more or any number of attendants free, nor does it arrange to furnish expensive equipments for such cars, nor permit of sale or distribution of the commodities en route. The freights are transported in carload lots from one shipper to one consignee, from point of origin to point of destination, and hauled on freight and not passenger trains.

Express cars are hauled on passenger trains. They are assigned, however, to such trains as the railroad may designate. They are not specially equipped for any one route or particular portion of the line. They are subject to be assigned wherever the traffic may be offering. While the railroad company does transport express messengers free in charge of express matter, it assumes no responsibility, the express company holding the railroad company harmless for accidents to its employees, assuming such responsibility itself.

As stated before, while there may be some similarity in some minor features between the mail service and the express service, the ordinary and usual express business is entirely dissimilar from the railroad mail service. And yet, even with the comparatively low class of freight transported so largely by express companies, as contrasted with the high-class matter carried in the mails, the average receipts for the transportation of express in many cases exceed, ton for ton, the average receipts from the transportation of mail under the present compensation fixed by the Government.

Reference has been made to the fact that on routes hauling the minimum amounts of mail the pay is not based on rate. The minimum allowance by the Government for mail service is $42.75 per mile per annum of postal route, which is 5.85 cents per mile of line per day. While not important in the aggregate tonnage of mails handled, these minimum pay routes are of very great importance to the country, forming as they do an important proportion of the total number of mail routes operated by the Government.

In the States south of the Ohio and Potomac rivers and east of the Mississippi River the report of the Postmaster-General for the year 1897 shows the total number of mail routes and the number of such routes operated at the minimum rate, with the service rendered by the railroads thereon, to be as follows:

	Total number of routes.	Number of routes at minimum pay.	Average number of round trips per week on minimum-rate routes.
North Carolina	56	17	7
South Carolina	37	12	9
Georgia	79	23	8.6
Florida	43	17	8.7
Alabama	43	11	9.7
Mississippi	25	3	8.6
Tennessee	35	11	6
Kentucky	46	9	10.4

Minimum-pay routes to total number of routes, 23 per cent.

As emphasizing the valuable services rendered to the public, and the small compensation received by the railroads for the operation of such routes, I beg to again refer to the operations of the six minimum-pay routes on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, as shown by the reports of the Postmaster-General which I have previously submitted and referred to.

It is such routes as these, representing in the Southern territory 23 per cent of the total number of postal routes, performing valuable, not to say indispensable, services for the communities thus reached, the aggregate pay for which to the railroads is inconsiderable, which serve to increase the so-called average rate per ton per mile received by the railroads for the transportation of the mails.

It is apparent that the reasonableness of this compensation must be considered with respect to the value of the services rendered and not gauged by the amount of mail carried, and, bearing this in mind, it can not be contended that a compensation which averages, as in the case of the Louisville and Nashville road, 5.32 cents per day for each mile of postal service rendered is excessive.

The Government officials have not been derelict to their duty or recreant to their trust in fixing this compensation, and the railroad companies can hardly be accused of imposing upon the people in the way of excessive compensation for the services rendered.

Conceding, as I do, that in performing this transportation service for the Government the railroad companies should not expect excessive pay, it will, I think, be as readily conceded that the Government should not ask them for services for which commensurate compensation is not allowed.

It is proper also to bear in mind the method by which the Government rate of pay is arrived at and allotment made. The weighing of the mails is entirely in the hands of the Government, and the railroads have no supervision over it. This is not true with respect to any other service the railroad companies perform.

In the next place, the weight is ascertained only once in four years for each road, and no increase in the allowance is made during that time. This arrangement works very largely to the benefit of the Government at the expense of the railroads.

To illustrate: The mails were weighed by the Government on all the lines operated by the Louisville and Nashville road in February, 1896, the previous weighing having been in February, 1892. The increased allowance by the Government, based on their weights in 1896 over 1892, was, for all the routes operated by the Louisville and Nashville Company, something over 3,000 miles of line, $99,219.61 per annum, an average of $23 per mile per year, or 6.3 cents per mile of road per day. This increase was due to the increased amount of service performed, as shown by the results ascertained by Government agents. It is apparent, therefore, that the railroad company suffers a material loss per annum from the fact that the weight of the mails used as a basis of compensation is ascertained only once in every four years. For the four years in question it is fair to assume that there was an average increase in weight for each of the four years, and as the total increase in compensation at the end of four years was $99,219.61, this would make an average increase of $17,304.90 per annum. In other words, the railroad company performed service for which it received no remuneration and for which it should have been paid, according to the Government valuation, the following amounts:

The second year after weighing	$17,304.90
The third year after weighing	34,609.80
The fourth year after weighing	51,914.70
Total loss	103,829.40

There is no other customer with whom the railroads do business on these terms, i. e., to take an average weight for a designated period as a basis of compensation for the succeeding four years, and to allow the customer to exceed that weight at his option without additional compensation therefor.

That the additional weight is being carried from year to year is proven by the Government reports, showing increases not for periods of four years, but the percentage of increase from year to year. In the last annual report of the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service there will be found several pages devoted to statement of "Improvements," from which it appears that during the last fiscal year there was added a total of 22,218 miles of new or improved service of railway post-office car routes to take care of the increased weight of mails offered for transportation.

As, for instance, on June 28, 1897, the service between Atlanta, Ga., and New Orleans, La., by way of Montgomery and Mobile, Ala., was improved by establishing two daily lines of 60-foot cars to take the place of two lines of 40-foot cars. This, as report goes on to say, was made necessary by the increased quantity of mail offering for transportation via this route to and from New York and New Orleans, La.

On July 29, 1897, there was established an additional line of railway post-office cars north bound between New Orleans and Montgomery, Ala.; also an additional line south bound between Mobile, Ala., and New Orleans, the superintendent explaining that it was found absolutely necessary to provide greater space and additional facilities to handle expeditiously the largely increasing mails between Atlanta, Montgomery, and New Orleans.

I have referred to these out of a great number of instances cited in the report, because they apply to the Louisville and Nashville road, and I have confined my analysis of the railway mail facilities and the compensation therefor to the line with which I am connected.

While the railroad will receive compensation for the additional postal-car mileage thus ordered into service, it will not for three years after the service is inaugurated receive any increased compensation for the increased weight of mails requiring those increased facilities, for the reason that the weights ascertained in February, 1896, will govern until February, 1900.

There is another very important service performed by the railroads for the Government, which the critics of or objectors to the present allowance would seem to entirely fail to take into consideration. As the committee knows, the railroads deliver at their own expense, without compensation by the Government, all mails between railroad stations and post-offices on the line of their roads when situated within designated limits—the limit is 80 rods. Out of a total of 674 post-offices on the line of the Louisville and Nashville road, the company has to deliver at its own expense the mails between post-offices and trains at 445 offices, the Post-Office Department making delivery at 229.

In addition to this, at important terminal points the railways furnish, in passenger stations, mail rooms for the use of railway post-office clerks and other Government employees, and also handle mails between such rooms and the trains with their own employees. The principal terminal or junction points on the Louisville and Nashville road at which we have to furnish, free of cost, rooms properly lighted and heated for the use of the Government clerks are: Cincinnati, Front Street Station and Grand Central Station; Louisville, Union Station; Junction City, Ky.; Bowling Green, Ky.; Nashville, Tenn.; Birmingham, Ala.; Montgomery, Ala.; Milan, Tenn.; East St. Louis, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo.

In this connection it is not perhaps proper to refer to the very large amount of free transportation furnished by the railroads to the Government officials and employees in connection with the mail service. I regret that I can not show what this amounts to for the Louisville and Nashville Company per annum. Our records do not show the aggregate mileage traveled by postal clerks, inspectors, superintendents, and other officials connected with the postal service of the Louisville and Nashville road.

Our rules provide for the free transportation of employees of the United States Post-Office Department, including not only postal clerks on their lines, but inspectors, special agents, superintendents, assistant superintendents in the Railway Mail Service; for the passage of postal clerks between the ends of their routes and their homes, if they reside within the limits embraced by their commission; for the passage of postal clerks under instructions to go to some point within the limits of their commission. This unquestionably amounts to a very large sum in the aggregate.

The report of the Postmaster-General shows that there were 7,602 postal clerks in service on June 30, 1897, and that they traveled 178,730,672 miles during the year ended June 30, 1897. At 2 cents per mile this would represent $3,574,613.44.

I have stated that the compensation paid the Louisville and Nashville road for transportation of mails for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1897, was $699,263.55. That the operating expenses properly allotted to the mail on basis of the proportion of the car mileage of cars used for transportation of the mails bore to the total car mileage of passenger trains were $515,120.26.

This calculation made no allowance for the payment of interest and taxes, legitimate obligations which had to be met in order to continue the operations of the road. Taking the total payments made by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company for that fiscal year, account of interest and taxes, and apportioning same to each of the several sources of revenue, passenger, freight, mail, and express, it is found that the proportion chargeable to mail earnings is $193,888.51. Therefore the total operating expenses, interest, and taxes chargeable to transportation of mails were $709,008.77. Total earnings credited to them were $699,263.55; deficit, $9,745.22.

In other words, while there was some profit in the Government allowance, in the mere transportation of mails, over the current expenses of operation, yet the compensation was not sufficient to pay the operating expenses and proportion of interest and taxes chargeable thereto. That is, if the passenger business and freight business of the company had been conducted with only the same relative compensation as the Government mails, the company would have been unable to pay its operating expenses and meet its legal obligations.

This does not include, let it be clearly understood, any allowance for or consideration of the question of dividends on the capital stock of the company.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, the statement of the auditor of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad for that railroad company, which commences on page 17, and the statement for the Cotton Belt Railroad, which commences on page 23.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the statements will be inserted in the RECORD.

The statements referred to are as follows:

STATEMENT FOR THE BURLINGTON ROAD, BY JOHN H. STURGIS, AUDITOR.

The pay of railroads for handling the mail is based on weight and the distance carried. This the Post-Office Department calls "pay for transportation," which gives rise to the impression that the service performed by the railroad consists only of transportation of the mails on its trains. As a matter of fact, this compensation is expected to cover a considerable amount of other service rendered by the railroad.

For example, the regulations of the Department require the railroad, by its agents, to carry the mail between the post-office and the railroad station, when they are not more than a quarter of a mile apart. The railroad is obliged to care for the mails while at its stations and at junction points to transfer them from one train to another; and of all these transactions a detailed record must be kept. The railroad is also required to furnish special facilities for mail clerks on its trains and to carry them free, and to furnish free transportation for agents and officers of the Post-Office Department.

The law has provided a schedule of pay according to which the rate decreases as the weight increases. Where the railroad handles a small amount of mail on a route its pay per pound is large, but the law provides that if a larger amount of mail is carried the rate per pound shall be much less.

The compensation per mile of railroad per year increases with the average weight carried the whole distance per day, but it does not increase in the same proportion, as the following schedule shows:

Average weight per day over whole length of route.	Tons per mile per year (365 days).	Compensation per mile per year.	Compensation per ton per mile.
Pounds.	Tons.
500	91.25	64.12	.7027
1,000	182.50	85.50	.4685
1,500	273.75	108.87	.3904
2,000	365.00	128.25	.3514
3,500	638.75	149.62	.2342
5,000	912.50	171.00	.1874
7,000	1,277.50	192.37	.1506
10,000	1,825.00	224.42	.1228
20,000	3,650.00	331.27	.0908

Every added ton, after 5,000 pounds, goes at 5.85 cents per ton per mile. The ordinary first-class freight rate west (not on passenger trains) is 50 cents per 100 for 200 miles, or $10 per ton, or 5 cents per ton per mile, while the Government pays 5.85 cents per ton per mile.

There are 82 mail routes on the Burlington system, and two of them, carrying more than 60 per cent of the total tonnage, earn less than 6 cents per ton per mile for transportation.

More than half the routes earn an average of 69½ cents per ton per mile, but carry only 10 per cent of the tonnage, and the pay on them is the poorest of any for the service done.

On a railroad like the Burlington there are many mail routes at the various rates, so that in order to determine whether the rate paid is a fair compensation for the service it will be necessary to compare the average pay received with the average pay from some other source for a similar service, if any exists.

The express matter which the railroad carries on its trains under the contract with one of the great express companies requires a less investment on the part of the railroad company, less service, and less risk, and yet the express company, a commercial corporation, pays the railroad company a greater amount per ton per mile for handling express matter than is paid by the Government for handling the mails.

As long as the amount paid by the Government for handling the mail is no greater than the amount paid by a commercial corporation in business for profit, with an inferior service, it can not be said that the Government is paying an excessive rate; but when the fact is that the Government pays less than the express company and requires more service, it is evident that the railroad company would be justified in asking that its mail pay be increased.

It will therefore be instructive to compare in detail the service performed by the railroad for the Post-Office Department with the service performed for the express company.

In addition to the cash compensation paid by the express company, it handles, free of charge and at its own risk, daily remittances of money from all the railroad stations to the railroad treasury, the value of which service at wholesale tariff rates amounts to more than $110,000 a year. The express company furnished free transportation on all its lines for all railroad packages of every kind.

An important contrast between the two classes of business is furnished by the fact that the express company contracts with the railroad company to release it from all liability to the express company's employees for injuries received on the trains. On the other hand, if an employee of the Post-Office Department is injured on the train the railroad company is liable to him individually to precisely the same extent as to a passenger who has paid his fare to insure his safe carriage.

The express company furnishes its own employees to load and unload its freight and to take care of it at stations and on the trains. The railroad employees do not handle a pound of express matter without extra compensation.

Mail matter, on the contrary, except in a few large cities, is not only loaded and unloaded and taken care of at stations exclusively by railroad employees, but the railroad employees must also act as mail carriers between post offices and railroad stations.

The actual cost of this service to this railroad company, being the value of its employees' time used in the service, was, for 1897, $35,603, and for transferring mails from one train to another, $23,341.

A comparison of these two kinds of business, side by side, on the trains, again shows a much greater amount of service and expense furnished by the railroad company for the Post-Office Department than for the express company.

Where there is no mail clerk on the train the mail pouches are handled exclusively by the train baggage man, while by his side, in the same car, is an express messenger in charge of the express matter. On the Burlington road last year 2,654,597 pouches were handled by railroad employees exclusively, covering 3,164,464 miles of service.

When a mail clerk is put in charge of the mail on a train, the railroad charges nothing for hauling him, nor for hauling express messengers in the discharge of their duties; but while no facilities other than an undivided portion of a bare baggage car are furnished the express company, the Post-Office Department is furnished a separate apartment or special car, elaborately fitted with special conveniences suited to the requirements of the business.

It is evident that the Government is not paying the Burlington railroad at too high a rate for handling the mail when one of the great express companies is willing to pay a higher rate for so much less service.

Any argument in regard to the justice of the mail pay of the railroads comprising the Burlington system will apply with equal or greater force to the country at large, the average rate paid per mile traveled by mails on the Burlington system being above the average for the whole country.

The "fast mail" is a special feature provided at great cost. Express matter is carried on regular trains without special train service.

CLASSIFICATION OF THE MAIL SERVICE ON RAILROADS.

The mail service may be divided into three grades, known as pouch service, apartment service, and railway post-office car service.

The first grade is where closed pouches are dispatched from one post-office to another, the pouches being handled, except at large termini, exclusively by railroad employees from post-office to post-office, the railroad keeping a record of every pouch, both on the trains and at the stations.

The second grade is where a part of a baggage car is partitioned off and fitted up for the use of a mail clerk, who sorts the mails en route, receiving the pouches from and delivering them to railroad employees, who, in turn, make deliveries to and from the post-offices.

The third grade is where a whole car is given up to the mail service, with one or more mail clerks in charge.

(1) Pouch service.—When mail service is first inaugurated on a new piece of road in a sparsely settled country, pouch service is sufficient, and the railroad company, which does all the work, is paid by weight handled, regardless of the number of packages. When one small town has mail for another town on the same route, it makes a pouch for it, which is put off by the baggageman at the proper station. Each small town will have several pouches for each train—a separate pouch for each destination on the route.

(2) Apartment service.—When the business begins to grow and the compensation with it, the Department steps in and orders apartment service. By doing so they increase the railroad's expenses and decrease its revenue. They increase its expense because they oblige the railroad to fit up a special apartment in a car with pigeonholes, racks, and all necessary appliances, according to Government specifications, and they decrease its revenue because the number of pouches, and therefore the weight handled, is decreased. Where formerly each town had several pouches for as many destinations, now each one has but one for the train, from which the mail is sorted to appropriate destination by the mail clerk en route.

As the business grows the Department demands and the railroad furnishes larger and more expensive compartments, but its compensation does not increase in proportion to the weight of mails carried in them, for the greater the weight carried the less the rate per pound. The schedule provided by Congress for an average weight of 1,000 pounds per day over the whole length of a route is 46.85 cents per ton per mile, while every pound carried over 5,000 goes at 5.85 cents per ton per mile.

(3) Railway Post-Office Service.—As the business continues to grow, the Department finally demands the use of a whole car, instead of part of one. So long as the mail can be accommodated in the cars run by the railroad for its other business, the pay for transportation on weight basis is supposed to cover all the handling of the mails, both on and off the trains; but when the Government requires that the railroad shall build special cars to be used as traveling post-offices, and shall increase its expense by hauling this additional equipment on its trains, Congress has wisely realized that additional compensation should be paid.

The railway post-office cars, elaborately fitted for this special use, can be used for no other purpose, and the railroad company is obliged not only to furnish a sufficient number of cars for actual daily service, but must keep in reserve a sufficient number to replace, at a moment's notice, any car which breaks down or has to be temporarily taken off for repairs or for changes required by the Government.

These cars must be built to conform exactly to the specifications of the Post-Office Department, and must be furnished with the very best and most expensive light, heat, safety appliances, etc.

The additional compensation paid for the use of railway post-office cars is based on their length. If a car were left standing on a side track, a fair percentage on the investment and a charge for repairs and depreciation would be sufficient compensation; but this is a small matter compared to the cost of constantly hauling the car in a fast passenger train, or in a special train, from one end of the railroad to the other.

The compensation on the Burlington route for the use of these railway post-office cars in 1897 was $220,580.81; they traveled 4,740,703 miles, or an average rate of only 4.65 cents per mile. For hauling home for repairs by freight train a freight car of private ownership the railroad charges 5 cents per mile.

When we consider that every pound of mail carried in special railway post-office cars could be carried in the ordinary cars of regular trains, it can not be denied that when the railroad is required to increase its investment and expense, by building and hauling these cars, a compensation is too small which does not equal the average cost of hauling such a car, to say nothing of the investment and proportionate share of the general expense of the railroad.

In a letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations in February, 1897, he says:

"On the Pennsylvania Railroad, in a special mail train consisting of six cars entirely for Department use, four of them are postal cars, paid for by the Department, and the other two are storage cars, which are not paid for. The total weight of mail carried in the six cars is 70,518 pounds, or 35 tons, a load which could easily be carried in the storage cars without the expense of the postal cars if the Government does not care to do post-office work en route. In the case of trains with only one postal car, the mail so hauled, were it not for the Government necessities of working in transit, would find a place in the ordinary baggage car without the expense to the railroad of hauling the postal car. I think this will illustrate to you that the railroads really have no use for the postal car that we require them to furnish, equipped in such manner that they can not possibly be used for any other purpose."

In testimony before the same committee, referring to the importance to the Government of maintaining this special service of traveling post-offices, he said:

"Some day, if I live long enough, I hope to show you how the car and wagon will dispense with the big city post-offices. The postmaster at New York said to me a few days ago that if we were not doing what we are doing on wheels he could not handle his mail in New York. The cars are doing so much separation that you would have to have a great deal larger post-office building in the cities were it not for these cars."

The same officer of the Government, emphasizing the importance to the Post-Office Department of the use of these traveling post-offices, says in his report for 1896:

"Marked as is the improvement in the rapid transit of mails, effected through the combined efforts of the Department and the carriers, perhaps the most noteworthy feature is the extent to which the distribution in the railway post-offices is now carried. No longer content with delivering into the larger post-offices the mail addressed thereto, the railway post-office now separates and arranges for immediate delivery by the letter carriers in the larger cities an immense and constantly increasing volume of mail to the extent of making it almost possible to supply the letter carriers from the postal car on its arrival with the mail intended for their personal distribution, which practically eliminates a very large amount of work that was formerly done in the post-office buildings.

"More and more of the work formerly performed in the city post-offices is thus transferred to the railway post-offices, the effect of which should be kept well in view when considering the necessity for increasing appropriations for this branch of the service, the idea being that expenditures of this nature will not only increase the efficiency of the mail service, but will greatly decrease the amount required for increasing Government buildings intended for post-office purposes."

SERVICE RENDERED BY RAILROADS WITHOUT PAY.

In order to furnish the very best facilities to the public which it serves, the railroad is constantly complying with requests of every kind from officers of the Post-Office Department beyond what it is required to do by law. It does so cheerfully and willingly for the good of the service and to secure that perfection of handling the mails which can only be secured by its constant cooperation. But there has grown up a practice in the Department which deprives the railroads of millions of dollars annually to which they are legitimately entitled under the laws. The law provides that the weight of mail on which the pay of the railroads is based shall be ascertained not less often than once in four years by weighing the mails for a period of thirty consecutive days.

The practice of the Department is to weigh no oftener than once in four years and to apply the pay so determined to the four succeeding years. The weight of mails carried by a railroad is constantly increasing, and, instead of prorating over the four past years a legal compensation for the increased weight found to have been carried since the last weighing, the Department allows no pay for the past increase, but applies the new rate for the succeeding four years, during which a still further increase will take place. The pay for a period of four years is based on the smallest weight carried during the period.

On the Burlington road the weighing of 1894-95 provided pay per year of $1,650,488.14 against $1,496,061.69 four years before, an increase in pay per year of $158,426.45, or 10.47 per cent. If we prorate this increase over the four preceding years, we find that this one railroad lost compensation to which it was entitled of more than $300,000 by this practice of the Department, and the loss before the next weighing will be still larger.

In its schedule of rates of pay for handling mail on railroads, the Department emphasizes, in capital letters, that the use of railway post-office cars will be paid for only "when authorized." On the Burlington road the Department made use of railway post-office car service in 1897, for which it did not pay, worth at Government rates $41,080.85.

DECREASE IN RATES PAID RAILROADS FOR HANDLING MAIL.

It has been suggested in Congress that while competition and legislation have produced a more or less constant reduction in rates for transportation of passengers and freight, there has been no change in the rate for carrying the mails since 1873. As a matter of fact, the schedule of pay for mail service is so cleverly devised that, without changing it from time to time, it provides in itself for a gradual reduction of the rate of pay, and taking any completed railroad as an example, the increasing weight of mails is being carried at a constantly decreasing rate.

STATEMENT FOR THE COTTON BELT ROAD, BY S. C. JOHNSON, GENERAL AUDITOR.

I submit herewith a few facts relating to the railway mail service on this line, which will show why the compensation for such service should not be reduced.

	Expenses, year ended June 30, 1897.
	Proportion of operating expenses chargeable to mail traffic		164,090.36
	Proportion of interest on bonds, taxes, interest, and exchange, and all other payments debited to income, chargeable to mail traffic		28,442.33
	Deficit			46,260.73

The proportion of operating expenses and fixed charges chargeable to mail traffic given above are arrived at on a car-mileage basis as follows:

The total operating expenses for the year ended June 30, 1897, amounted to $3,855,241, the proportion chargeable to passenger traffic (including mail and express, carefully arrived at in accordance with established rules) being $1,205,196.94. The total passenger-car mileage, including mileage of mail and express cars, was 6,180,317. The total mileage of mail and express apartment cars was 1,090,208. The total number of square feet of floor space in the apartment cars is 7,545.26, of which 3,672.53, or 49 per cent, is allotted to mail service. Forty-nine per cent of the total mileage of mail and express apartment cars is 534,201, which, added to the mileage of postal cars (exclusively), viz, 307,288, makes 841,489 car miles on account of mail traffic.

The average expense per passenger-car mile is $0.195, and multiplying that amount by 841,489, the number of car miles on account of mail traffic gives $164,090.36, the proportion of operating expenses chargeable to mail traffic. The proportion of interest on bonds, taxes, interest, and exchange, and all other payments debited to income, chargeable to mail traffic, is arrived at in a similar manner. The per cent of passenger earnings, including mail and express and 50 per cent of miscellaneous earnings, to gross earnings is 21.91, and the passenger proportion of the fixed charges, which amounts to $954,330.62, is arrived at by taking 21.91 per cent of that amount, which is $209,115.73. The average per passenger-car mile would be $0.0338, and multiplying that amount by 841,489, the number of car miles chargeable to mail traffic, gives $28,442.33.

The basis used in arriving at the expenses chargeable to mail traffic seems to be an equitable one, and if any criticism could be offered against it it would be that the proportion allotted to mail traffic is too small, because the mail cars are more expensive than the ordinary passenger cars, and the apartments of the mail and express cars allotted to mail service are fitted up with racks, cases, etc., while the express apartments are simply left bare.

From the foregoing figures it will be seen that the expenses chargeable to mail traffic are $46,260.73 more than the gross receipts from mail traffic for the year ended June 30, 1897.

SERVICE PERFORMED BY THE RAILROAD IN CONNECTION WITH MAIL TRAFFIC.

It is usually considered that the service performed by a railroad in connection with the mail traffic is simply to haul the mail on its regular trains from one terminal to another, or merely the transportation feature on the trains. There are a number of other items of service which railroads are obliged to perform in connection with mail traffic which are seldom, if ever, taken into consideration, among which may be mentioned the following, with an estimate of the value of such service performed by this company during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1897:

Transportation of postal clerks:
Number of miles traveled by postal clerks on this system	1,677,312.8
Average revenue per passenger per mile	$0.0236
Amount that would have been received had postal clerks paid the same average revenue per mile that was paid by passengers	$39,584.58
Cost of light, heat, oil, etc., for apartments in 15 mail and express cars, 365 days, at $37.97 per day	13,895.05
Carrying mail between depots and post-offices	7,134.00
Use of space at depots for handling mail, and light, fuel, etc., for same	5,448.00
Transferring mail from train to train	2,669.40
Use of cars at terminal points for handling mail	912.00
Loading mail at unusual hours	749.40
Furnishing and repairing station trucks on which to handle mails	100.00

All of the foregoing items and others are not specifically paid for by the Government, but the railroads are required to perform the service, and the general compensation which they receive, based on the weight of the mails, ascertained once in four years, is supposed to cover all of these items, as well as the main item of hauling the mails on the trains. These items of expense hereinbefore enumerated are, of course, included in the total operating expenses heretofore mentioned, a proportion of which has been allotted to mail earnings on a ratio of the mail-car mileage to the total passenger-car mileage. The figures representing the expenses of these additional classes of service are estimates of the actual cost to this company.

Referring to the items included in the foregoing statement for carrying mail between depots and post-offices, use of space at depots for handling mail, light, fuel, etc., for same, transferring mail from train to train, use of cars at terminal points for handling mail, loading mail at unusual hours, and furnishing and repairing station trucks on which to handle mails, desire to say that, in the judgment of our operating department, if the Government was obliged to contract for such service independently it would cost it at least double the amounts named.

Besides the transportation of postal clerks in the foregoing figures, other officials and employees of the Post-Office Department holding Government transportation are transported free of charge by this company, but it is impracticable to get at any fair estimate of such free transportation furnished.

Compensation for postal cars.

Total number square feet of floor space of postal cars	1,850
Number of miles run by postal cars during the year ended June 30, 1897	307,288
Compensation received for these postal cars	$10,000.00
Average revenue per car mile	$0.0312
Cost per annum for repairs, light, heat, ice, oil, cleaning, etc	$4,409.20
Cost of equipping five locomotives with vestibule tenders, at $450 each	$2,250.00

In regard to the item of vestibule tenders, it may not be generally known that the Cotton Belt is the pioneer in providing that means of protecting the lives of the postal clerks and the valuable mail carried in these postal cars. There is no other railroad in the United States to-day that has vestibule tenders attached to its locomotives used in hauling trains which carry postal cars. This, together with many other improvements in the equipment providing for the safety and convenience of the Government employees and to facilitate the handling of mails, made upon the advice and request of the Government officials from time to time, without extra compensation, shows that this railroad company and other railroad companies are the allies, not the enemies, of the Government, and that they are making earnest efforts to make the Railway Mail Service a success in every respect.

It will be seen from the foregoing that the pay which this company receives for the use of these postal cars, which are equipped with all modern appliances, such as steam heat, Pintsch gas, etc., average $0.0312 per car mile, and this company furnishes the motive power, train crews, etc., to haul these cars over its own roadbed. The established rate paid by railroads to other roads for the use of passenger cars is 3 cents per mile, and the road using the car pays all the expenses incident to transportation, so that the average revenue per car mile for these postal cars, after deducting therefrom the expenses of transportation, is virtually less than the rate which we receive for our passenger cars when they are on other railroads.

When we haul a Pullman sleeper deadhead over the line, we receive 20 cents per car mile for that service, and furnish no heat, light, etc. Of course, the sleepers are more expensive than mail cars, but it will be conceded that the mail cars should pay at least half the rate paid by the Pullman Company.

which would be 10 cents per car mile, while the foregoing figures show that the actual rate per car mile paid is but a trifle over 3 cents.

Another item which enters into the expense of furnishing postal cars is that it is always necessary to have some extra cars over and above those that are actually needed in a line of postal cars, to be used in the event of an accident disabling one or more of the postal cars in service. On account of the manner in which these postal cars are fitted up they can not be used for any other service, but must lie idle until some other mail car has been rendered unfit for service.

METHOD OF FIXING THE COMPENSATION FOR FOUR YEARS PROSPECTIVELY.

The existing method of fixing the compensation for railroad mail pay has resulted in a large amount of mail matter being actually carried by this company for which no pay has been received. The increase in the compensation per annum, which was the result of the last weighing of the mails, was $31,591.70, which represented the increase in the weight of mails per annum over the weight of mails per annum four years previous. All branches of the business in the country contiguous to this line experienced a steady growth during those four years, and it is, therefore, safe to assume that the mail traffic also increased steadily. The increase during those four years was, therefore, approximately four times one-half of the annual increase, or $63,183.40. Therefore, this company, under the present system of fixing the compensation for mail service, was deprived of pay for carrying mails during those four years to the extent of over $60,000.

I have examined the law in regard to fixing compensation of railroads for carrying mails by arriving at the average weight of mail carried, and do not find that it contains a provision to the effect that the compensation is always to be fixed prospectively as at present, but the law simply states that "the average weight is to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such manner as the Postmaster-General may direct;" but it is the custom of the United States Post Office Department to make these periodical weighings the basis of mail pay for the four succeeding years.

COMPARISON WITH EXPRESS RATES.

The Pacific Express Company, which operates over this line, pays a fixed rate per annum for the service rendered by the railway company, and I am informed that no statistics have been kept by the express company as to the tonnage transported, rate per ton, etc., and for that reason it is impossible to make any comparison of the compensation for mail service with the compensation for express service on this line. Such a comparison would not be equitable, because the apartments of cars allotted to express service are furnished bare, while the railway company goes to a great deal of expense in fitting up the apartments furnished for mail service with racks, cases, etc., and the employees of the railway company do not touch the express, even to unload it from the cars or load it into the cars. It is handled exclusively by employees of the express company. Another thing to be taken into consideration in any attempt to compare mail tonnage with express tonnage would be the enormous amount of car space, for the weight handled, furnished the Government.

COMPARISON WITH FREIGHT RATES.

It might appear that inasmuch as freight rates have been largely reduced in the last twenty years the compensation for mail service should be subject to a corresponding reduction. While it is a fact that the railroads have been forced to reduce their freight rates, they have been able to offset this reduction, in a measure, by largely increasing the carrying capacity of freight cars, which has had the effect of reducing the expense of hauling what is termed "low-class" freight, such as lumber, coal, iron, etc.; but they have been unable to effect any appreciable reduction in the expense of hauling what is termed "high-class" freight, which would form a more reasonable comparison with mail traffic, and therefore the rates on high-class freight have not been reduced in the section of country traversed by this line. The reductions which have served to bring down the average revenue per ton per mile have all been in the rates on what is termed "low-class" freight. This is not the case with the mail traffic, as the service performed by the railway companies in connection with the mail traffic to-day is much more expensive than the service twenty years ago, while the mail pay has not been increased during that period to correspond with the increased expense.

Mr. QUAY. If the Secretary will have the kindness to return to page 61, I wish to have read the conclusions which Mr. Knott reached from the analysis which he submitted to the committee. I will ask the Secretary to read the paragraphs marked, from 1 to 7, inclusive, on page 61, and I earnestly invite the attention of the Senate to those conclusions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

1. That under the present law there has been and will continue to be marked reductions in the average rate of compensation paid.

2. That owing to the varying conditions under which mails have to be and are transported by the railroads in meeting the demands of the public, an average rate per unit of weight furnishes no proper basis upon which to estimate the reasonableness of compensation.

3. That there is no standard by which to compare the average charge or rate stated to be received for the transportation of freight with the alleged compensation for the transportation of mails. I use the phrase "alleged compensation" because the press and pamphlets and books have used entirely misleading and erroneous figures, and I am simply saying, in the first place, there is no standard of comparison, and, in the second place, the figures used are erroneous.

4. That the compensation paid by the Government for the transportation of mail is not commensurate with the service rendered, and is less than is paid by the public for service on the same trains on which the postal matter is handled.

5. That the Government does not contribute for the transportation of mails the proper or adequate share, as related to what the public pays for the transportation of passengers or freights, for the maintenance and operation of the railroads over which such service is performed.

6. The mail transportation is performed under conditions not applicable to any other service, and the compensation is relatively less than that received for any other traffic handled.

7. The average compensation for the service rendered—i. e., per unit of car mileage furnished for the transportation of mails—is 25 per cent less in gross earnings and 50 per cent less in net earnings than the Louisville and Nashville Company receives for the transportation of passengers on the same trains per unit of car furnished.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, this was the consensus of the opinion of the representatives of some forty or fifty railway corporations; and, as a matter of course, it suggested itself to the committee that the railway companies were probably interested in establishing their view of the case. Accordingly, the Post-Office Department was sought, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in whose charge the railway transportation is, was brought before the committee. He testified very intelligently and at some length, and the conclusions derived from the hearings of the Department were exactly those which were derived from the statements of the railway companies. I will ask that the examination of Second Assistant Postmaster-General Shallenberger shall be inserted in the RECORD. I will not ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

The examination referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. W. S. SHALLENBERGER, SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

The CHAIRMAN (Senator QUAY). You understand, Mr. Shallenberger, the object of the investigation now being made by this committee into the matter of the railway mail pay. We shall be glad to have such information as you can give us on the subject.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The object of the investigation, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, is to determine whether the rate of compensation now paid under the statute to railways for the transportation of the mails is reasonable or not, and whether the Department has any suggestions to make to you as a committee along that line.

I presume also that you wish a statement as to the pay of railway post-office car service, which pay has been called in question on the floor of the House and of the Senate, and which seems not to be well understood. At the same time, and collateral to these statements, I expect to give you as fully as I can a comparison between the rates of transportation for United States mails and the current rates charged by express companies for the transportation of merchandise as well as for the transportation of money and bonds, and the comparative compensation which the railways receive from the express companies for the carrying of their matter and from the United States Government for the carriage of its mails.

In approaching this subject I would just say that I was greatly impressed when I came into the Department with the magnitude of the expenditures of the Government for this service. My experience had been rather limited, but as I had been engaged in manufacturing——

Senator ALLISON. You might state at this point, if you will, whether this class of service comes under your immediate jurisdiction.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That, I suppose, I should have stated at the outset. As Second Assistant Postmaster-General I have under my supervision the entire subject of mail transportation, including domestic, foreign, and star-route services.

I was about to say that when I entered the Department I was greatly impressed with the magnitude of these expenditures, and in view of the increasing deficit I resolved that I would give very careful investigation to the subject myself, independently of any action of Congress.

I have had the chiefs of my divisions assist me in that investigation, as far as their other duties would permit, for the last six months. We have tried, for instance, to compare our service with the service in England, where, we are told, a handsome surplus is the result of the operations of the department, while in this country we have had a deficit of $11,000,000 for the last year.

It has been intimated, for that reason, that our service was not so well administered as the service in Great Britain. But in Great Britain I find that there is no longer haul on railways than 400 miles, while in this country we have a haul of 3,500 miles and over. The number of square miles to be served in Great Britain is 121,000, while in this country the number of square miles to be covered is 2,900,000, exclusive of Alaska, which, if included, would largely improve the comparison in favor of the United States.

When we remember also, as I have stated, that Great Britain has no line of railways longer than 400 miles, while we have over 3,500 miles of a line, as from New York to San Francisco, I do not hesitate to say that the expenditures in behalf of our service are less in proportion than the expenditures under the postal department of Great Britain.

I also assert that if we take the same radius, 400 miles, from New York City, including the New England States and the Middle States of this country, we will find that the revenue proportionately or the surplus proportionately would be quite as heavy as it is in Great Britain, while the population per square mile is very much less. The population per square mile in England is 331, while in the United States it is about 23. The conditions of service in Great Britain differ so widely from the conditions here that, taking them into consideration, I am free to say the comparison is decidedly in favor of the United States.

The question as to what are the rates of transportation in this country is not well understood, because it has been said that the law has not been changed or modified since 1878, and that therefore the rates are the same.

Senator QUAY. I think we had better have the law put into the record, so that we can see what it is.

Senator ALLISON. Yes; that is quite desirable.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have a statement of the law here and can give it.

Senator FAULKNER. You had better state what the law was in 1878 and then state what it is to-day; that will show the difference.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The law of March 3, 1873, is as follows:

"SEC. 3999. If the Postmaster-General is unable to contract for carrying the mail on any railway route at a compensation not exceeding the maximum rates herein provided, or for what he may deem a reasonable and fair compensation, he may separate the letter mail from the other mail and contract, either with or without advertising, for carrying such letter mail by horse express or otherwise, at the greatest speed that can reasonably be obtained, and for carrying the other mail in wagons or otherwise, at a slower rate of speed.

"SEC. 4000. Every railway company carrying the mail shall carry on any train which may run over its road, and without extra charge therefor, all mailable matter directed to be carried thereon, with the person in charge of the same.

"SEC. 4002. The Postmaster-General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation hereafter to be paid for the transportation of mails on railroad routes upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned:

"First. That the mails shall be conveyed with due frequency and speed; and that sufficient and suitable room, fixtures, and furniture, in a car or apartment properly lighted and warmed, shall be provided for route agents to accompany and distribute the mails.

"Second. That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of 200 pounds, $50; 500 pounds, $75; 1,000 pounds, $100; 1,500 pounds, $125; 2,000 pounds, $150; 3,500 pounds, $175; 5,000 pounds, $200, and $25 additional for every additional 2,000 pounds; the average weight to be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty, at such times after June 30, 1873, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct."

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. A reduction of 10 per cent was made by the act of July 12, 1876, as will be seen by the following section:

"REDUCTION OF 10 PER CENT.

* * * "Provided, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation of all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 10 per cent per annum from the rates fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1873, for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight." * * *

A still further reduction of 5 per cent was made by the act approved June 17, 1878, as follows:

"ADDITIONAL REDUCTION OF 5 PER CENT.

"And provided further, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1878, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 5 per cent per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes,' approved July 12, 1876."

These are the acts relating to the subject, with the exception of the act relating to the land-grant railroads.

Senator FAULKNER. Those you have read show a reduction of 15 per cent from the act of 1873?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; strictly speaking, 14¼ per cent. The section relating to land-grant railroads is as follows:

"ALLOWANCE ON LAND-GRANT ROADS.

"SEC. 4001. All railway companies to which the United States have furnished aid, by grant of lands, right of way, or otherwise, shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and until such price is fixed by law, the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation. (Act of March 3, 1873.)

"That railroad companies whose railroad was constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress, on the condition that the mails should be transported over their road at such price as Congress should by law direct, shall receive only 80 per cent of the compensation authorized by this act." (Act of July 12, 1876, section 13.)

A schedule of present rates for mail transportation I have given in such manner as that they may be compared more nearly with the quotations made by express companies and railroads for other traffic. Our law, if you will notice, gives an annual compensation that may be reduced to a daily compensation, but still it is not quite so well understood as if I put the figures in the way which I will put them, and which I think you will agree with me is a little plainer.

The daily average weight of mails over the whole route being 200 pounds, the pay per mile per annum for transportation under the act of 1873, as modified by the acts of July 12, 1876, and June 17, 1878, is $1.17 per ton per train mile per day, which is a rate of 5.85 cents per 100 pounds, the quotations of the railroads being usually per 100 pounds for small weights. When it comes to tons it is said to be "per ton per mile."

In the table which I submit I have reduced the figures to the ton rate and the 100-pound rate.

For 500 pounds carried daily the rate is 70 cents per ton per train mile, while the rate per 100 pounds is 3.5 cents.

For 1,000 pounds carried per day the rate is 46.8 cents per ton per train mile, or 2.34 cents per 100 pounds per train mile.

For 2,000 pounds carried per day the rate reduces very considerably, to 35 cents per ton, in round figures, per train mile per day, or 1.75 cents per 100 pounds per train mile.

Then when we come to 4,000 pounds per day the rate per ton reduces from 35 cents to 21 cents in round numbers per train mile, or 1.07 cents per 100 pounds.

When we get as high as 5,000 pounds per day the rate per ton reduces from 21 cents to 18.7 cents per ton per train mile per day, or ninety-six one-hundredths of a cent per 100 pounds per train mile per day.

When we reach 20,000 pounds per day, as many railroads do, the rate is reduced from 18.7 cents to 9 cents per ton per train mile per day—less than one-half of the rate for 5,000 pounds.

Senator ALLISON. That is less than one-half a cent per 100 pounds.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; it is less than half a cent per 100 pounds per train mile per day.

For 50,000 pounds per day the rate reduces from 9 cents per ton per train mile to 7 cents per ton per train mile, or thirty-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per 100 pounds—which is a little more than a third of a cent per 100 pounds per mile.

When we reach 100,000 pounds as a daily average the rate reduces from 7 to 6.4 cents per ton per train mile per day—the 100-pound rate being thirty-two one-hundredths of a cent.

On reaching 200,000 pounds per day the rate again reduces from 6.4 cents to 6.1 cents per ton per day, or three-tenths of 1 cent per 100 pounds.

When we reach 300,000 pounds as a daily average—and we have one route in this country that exceeds that—the rate is 5 cents per ton per mile per day, or three-tenths of a cent per 100 pounds—a trifle less than that.

Now, the reason for this is that under the law all mail carried in excess of 5,000 pounds must be carried at the minimum rate of 5.8 cents per ton per mile. Every ton in excess of 2½ tons must be carried at that low rate.

It must be understood that those rates quoted constitute the daily compensation, whether mails are carried on one or on numerous trains during the twenty-four hours.

Senator CULLOM. The total amount on that one road——

Mr. SHALLENBERGER (interposing). For that one day—is at that rate.

Senator CULLOM. Even though there should be a dozen trains.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; and, as a matter of fact, on the route carrying this 300,000 pounds per day there are 101 dispatches.

Mr. WHITE. Fifty each way.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is the road running out of New York to Jersey City. We have fifty dispatches on that road each way per day; and on any train going out we can divide up this heavy weight and send it on any or all trains at this low rate.

This is a matter at our discretion wholly. We can send mail out of this city upon any and all trains, while express matter goes mostly at night.

The compensation paid for railway postal cars is as follows:

For cars 40 feet long, $25 each per track mile per annum. The rate per mile of length, round trip, is 0.8 cents. The rate per mile run, single trip, is 3.4 cents.

For a car 45 feet long the rate is $30 per mile per annum; the rate per mile of length, round trip, is 8 cents, or for a single trip the rate per mile run is 4 cents.

For a 50-foot car the rate is $40 per mile per annum; the rate per mile of length, round trip, is 11 cents, and for a single trip, 5.4 cents.

A 60-foot car has a rate of $50 per mile per annum, or 14 cents per mile of length, round trip, or 7 cents per mile of run, single trip.

The average paid would be 4.9 cents, or nearly 5 cents a single trip for all our railway post-office cars per mile.

We can readily carry that figure in our minds—say a fraction less than 5 cents per mile per trip.

That table will show that while there has been a notable reduction in the traffic rates of railroad freights in the last fifteen years, the reduction of rates per ton for railway-mail pay has been very considerably greater—more especially if we compare the character of service.

As far as I have been able to ascertain, the reduction has been confined chiefly to heavy freights—the lower grades of freight—for the reason that the power of locomotives has been so very considerably increased, and the capacity of freight cars, and the number of cars to a train have been so considerably increased that it is possible now to carry heavy bulk freight at very much lower rates than was possible fifteen years ago. I am informed that reduction has been chiefly effected in that class of freight.

When we come to express matter and passenger traffic, I have been unable to find much reduction on the rates, for the reason, as I think, that in proportion as the demand for faster and better service goes on in this country a train must be made up lighter, with fewer cars, than it was made up fifteen years ago. Competition is so lively and the public demand is so great that railways are constantly competing with each other to reach a terminal point quickly; hence they do their utmost to reduce the outfit to the lowest possible weight.

Our railway post-office cars must necessarily go in the passenger trains, so that we can not expect that the rate of reduction of mail pay will be as heavy as that of bulk freight. But notwithstanding that fact and the fact stated that the average passenger train now has only four and a half cars, while freight trains have been doubled and trebled in many instances, we are able, by the peculiar manner in which this law is framed, to secure from the railroad companies a large reduction in proportion as weight of mail has increased.

Senator ALLISON. It is an automatic reduction?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; it is an automatic reduction. To show the reduction that has occurred in these late years, I have taken as examples some twenty railroads, which I will name. On the road from Concord to White River Junction——

Senator ALLISON. Is that Concord in New Hampshire?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; it is a road of 60 miles in length. In 1881 the rate of cost per ton per mile on that road was 19 cents, omitting fractions. In 1897 the rate per ton per mile was 10 cents.

Senator CULLOM. What is that; freight?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; it is mail matter. In addition to that, I will say that the average of round trips per week in 1881 was 17, while the average round trips in 1897 was 28.

Senator ALLISON. On that line?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; on that line—the line running from Concord, N. H., to White River Junction.

Take next the road from Boston to Albany—one of the prominent roads in the country—which carries 40,000,000 pounds per annum.

In 1881 there was on that road 45 average round trips per week. In 1897 there was an average of 90. In 1881 the rate per ton per mile on that road was 8 cents. In 1897 the rate per ton per mile was 6.4 cents.

Take next the New York and Buffalo route. In 1881 we paid 6.6 cents per ton per mile. In 1897 the rate was 6 cents per ton per mile.

On that road, the New York and Buffalo, in 1881 we made 40 round trips per week.

On the same road in 1897 we made 109 round trips per week. Take now the road from Canandaigua to Tonawanda—a very small road, which is in a populous district. In 1881 the cost per ton per mile on that road was $1.18. In 1897 the cost per ton per mile on that road was 70 cents—a considerable reduction.

Senator ALLISON. That is a short road, you say?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is a short road, only 86 miles long, but it is in a populous section of the country.

These figures show that in the Eastern States, where population is dense, the reduction has been going on. That is a reduction of 48 cents per ton per mile on that road.

Senator ALLISON. That is due you say, to an increase of mail to practically the same population, or perhaps not very largely increased population?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The population has increased very much less than in the Western States. That is why I take this road. It is to show that in even the Eastern section of the country, where but slight increase of population has taken place, a considerable reduction has taken place in the rates of mail pay.

Senator CULLOM. As Senator ALLISON says, it is a case in which the mail has increased largely, notwithstanding that the population has not increased much, if at all?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes. The increase of mail on that road has been from 71,540 pounds per annum in 1881 to 175,200 pounds per annum in 1897. Now, this applies to no other class of transportation on that road. The fact that the railroad is carrying, say, 85 tons of freight for a manufacturer, for whom it carried 35 in 1881, does not enable that manufacturer now to demand such proportionate rate of reduction.

Senator CULLOM. Are you sure that a reduction of freights has not occurred there in the same proportion that the mail reductions have occurred?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I feel quite confident that the reductions in first-class freight can not be compared with those of the mail transportation.

Now, take the New York and Philadelphia road, which is the largest route in the country. In 1881 we paid that road 6.4 cents per ton per mile; in 1897 we paid it 5.8 cents per ton per mile. In 1881 the average number of round trips per week on that road was 107; in 1897 the average number of trips on that road was 209.

Senator FAULKNER. It was 107 round trips per week in 1881?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; as against 209 round trips per week in 1897.

Thus I could follow along with all these twenty roads, but it is not necessary. These results, with a number of other results, are all given in this table which I will leave with you.

Senator ALLISON. I wish you would give the names of those twenty routes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will do so. They are the route from Concord to White River Junction, from Boston to Albany, from New York to Buffalo, from Canandaigua to Tonawanda, from New York to Philadelphia, from Atlanta to West Point, from Nashville to Hickman, from Glasgow Junction to Glasgow, from Dayton to Toledo, from Columbus to Pittsburg, from Peoria to Rock Island, from Milwaukee to La Crosse, from St. Paul to Duluth, from Mankato to Wells, from Hannibal to Sedalia, from Kansas City to Denver, from Topeka to Kansas City, from the Union Pacific Transfer to Ogden, from Salt Lake City to Stockton, from San Francisco to Ogden.

Senator FAULKNER. Does that list present a fair average of the conditions of the increase of mail and the reduction in the cost of service throughout the country?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. My belief is that it does. My request to Mr. Crew was to prepare the statement on that basis and with that intent.

Senator QUAY. You have a statement there showing the figures between Buffalo and New York?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Senator ALLISON. I did not hear any name reading from Chicago to Council Bluffs, or to Omaha, or anything in that direction.

Mr. CREW. We can prepare those statements for the committee.

Senator ALLISON. Those are through routes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have some tables that show the figures between Chicago and Omaha.

Senator ALLISON. I would like a table covering the lines—say three or four of them—all centering in Chicago and Omaha.

Senator CULLOM. And also say Minneapolis.

Senator ALLISON. Yes; and two or three running from Chicago to St. Paul or Minneapolis.

Senator FAULKNER. That is a very good idea.

Senator ALLISON. Figures showing the increase of mail, the rate of pay in 1881, and the rate of pay now—to show how it works out as applied to those sections of the country.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Instead of taking 20 routes, we can take 20 or any other number suggested by the committee.

Now, if the committee please, when the effort is made to reduce the compensation we are confronted with the conditions of our service, which are so exacting that the reply is made to us by the railroad companies that they can not possibly consent to any reduction of rate.

In order that you may know the discretion which the Postmaster-General is exercising and which has been referred to sometimes as not warranted by law, I would like to offer here the recent instructions issued by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in connection with order No. 50, dated December 4, 1897, relative to the transportation of mails by railroads:

"SEC. 711. Railway company must carry mails on any train.—Every railway company carrying the mail shall carry on any train which may run over its road, and without extra charge therefor, all mailable matter directed to be carried thereon, with the person in charge of the same. (R. S., section 4981.)

"NOTE.—The Department decides that the above section contemplates the carrying of mails on any train with or without an employee of the Post-Office Department in charge.

"SEC. 712. To carry supplies, post-office inspectors, etc., without specific charge.—Railroad companies are required to convey upon any train, without specific charge therefor, all mail bags, post-office blanks, stationery supplies, and all duly accredited agents of the Department and post-office inspectors upon the exhibition of their credentials. (As modified February 2, 1893.)

"SEC. 713. When railroad companies are required to take mails from and deliver them into post-offices.—Every railroad company is required to take the mails from and deliver them into all terminal post-offices, whatever may be the distance between the station and post-office, except in cities where other provision for such service is made by the Department."

I will say in reference to that that we find about 7,000 stations where the post-office is more than 80 rods distant, which we supply by messenger service, costing us over $1,000,000 per annum. There are about 20,000 stations that are not thus supplied by our messenger service and which the railroad companies are compelled to supply or else to see that the postmaster himself agrees to handle the mails.

Here I wish to say also that the railroad companies' employees have to make two trips for every single trip that our messenger makes.

A railway messenger must go to the post-office, take the mail to the train, and take it back; so he has to make two round trips in the performance of that service.

Senator CULLOM. You mean to say the railway agent goes after the mail to the post-office?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; if it is within a quarter of a mile from the station. The railroad company, before the arrival of the train, must send from the station a messenger to the post-office, bring the mail and dispatch it, and must then take the incoming mail from the station to the post-office.

Senator FAULKNER. With regard to this question of the carriage of the mails by the railroad companies to and from these 20,000 post-offices, where you say they deliver and collect, have you made any estimates relative to the cost of that work to the railroads as compared with the cost to the Government for the delivery service which it performs at the other 7,000 offices?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; but I know it costs us over $1,000,000 for the 7,000 post-offices. On that basis it would be $3,000,000 per year or over for the railroads. They estimate it at over $4,000,000 a year.

Senator FAULKNER. You say you expect the post-office inspectors and other agents of the Department to be transported on any train that they may choose to go upon. Under that regulation are they transported in the postal car or have they the privilege of the regular passenger cars?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They have the privilege of any passenger car.

Senator ALLISON. But not of the sleeping cars?

Senator FAULKNER. The railroad does not control the sleeping car.

Mr. WHITE. They only have to pay the sleeping car fare, however.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Here is another expense to the railroads, an expense on which we insist, though against their protests:

"At all points at which trains do not stop, where the Department deems the exchange of mails necessary, a device for the receipt and delivery of mails, satisfactory to the Department, must be erected and maintained, and pending the erection of such device the speed of trains must be slackened, so as to permit the exchange to be made with safety."

Senator ALLISON. Those are the catchers?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Those are the catchers. We require the roads to maintain catchers. Instances have occurred in which a full sack of mail has been torn to shreds, and even life destroyed, and heavy damages paid by railroad companies by reason of the absence of some device which would safely deliver mail. We have called the attention of the companies frequently to the additional fact that our equipment is often destroyed, and that they must, therefore, either slow their trains or provide catchers.

Senator CULLOM. How much is the cost of that?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. For a crane and catcher, probably $15.

Mr. ALLISON. At each station?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Senator FAULKNER. Do you know how many stations of that kind there are in the country?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I presume we have the figures for it, but I could not give them to you just now. We have a very great many. I would say in reference to that that quite recently I have been in correspondence with one of the leading lines of the country with reference to putting in catchers, and they replied to me that it would be a very serious tax on them, as the expense would be from $20,000 to $25,000 for their system.

Senator CULLOM. The expense of the catchers?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; cranes and catchers, complete.

Senator QUAY. Suppose the train misses the catcher, as I have seen trains do in Florida sometimes; do you fine them?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The post office messenger is expected to take charge of it and hold it until the next train arrives.

Senator QUAY. My question was whether the companies are fined for failing to take up the "catch?"

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have no fines or penalties for that, because as a rule our own employees are responsible for the catch. The punishment should be visited upon them and not upon the company.

The Department designates what the device shall be, and that when installed it shall be satisfactory to the Department, and we insist upon inspecting it before we accept it.

There are several other points in these regulations which I would like to present, so that you may have them before you:

"SEC. 727. Full railway post-office cars and pay therefor.—No payment for railway post-office cars can be allowed unless full cars of the length authorized (inside measurement), fully equipped in accordance with the requirements of the General Superintendent of Railway Mail Service, are furnished and used exclusively for post-office purposes.

"The assignment of space in cars used partially for other than railway post-office purposes will not entitle the railroad company to railway post-office car pay."

We have, I think, about 2,700 apartments in cars. Of these there are 900 apartments that are less than 16 feet in length. We have 1,700 that are over 16 feet in length, for which we pay on account of space absolutely nothing. In those apartments we require our railway post office clerks to do the work of distribution. The weight of mail carried is very light.

No matter what the value of the train may be, or how valuable that space may be for express freight or for baggage, we demand and insist upon getting it for the purpose of distribution of the mails.

Senator ALLISON. Without postal-car pay?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; and without any extra compensation whatever.

Senator FAULKNER. Yet it is arranged in the interior for the distribution of the mail?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Senator ALLISON. And lighted?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes. This is a business that of course requires a most brilliant light.

In addition to those requirements we have latterly found that in order to keep track of our mails the railroad companies must keep a record. Our regulations therefore say:

"SEC. 728 (b). Railroad companies to keep a record of closed mails.—Railroad companies shall keep a record of all closed pouches handled by their employees, and any irregularity will be immediately reported to the division superintendent of Railway Mail Service. Specific instructions in regard to the character of the record to be kept, and of the report to be made, will be issued through the office of the General Superintendent of Railway Mail Service." (As modified December 4, 1897.)

Senator ALLISON. These railroad employees thus handling the mails receive no compensation from the Government?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. None whatever.

Senator FAULKNER. Nor does the railroad for any space occupied?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. For no space short of the 40 feet. All space under 40 feet is in what we call apartment cars, and is furnished free for distribution of mail by our clerks.

We have some causes for fines, and we impose fines. The regulations on that subject say:

"SEC. 735 (b). Causes for which fines will be imposed.—Fines will be imposed unless satisfactory explanation be given in due time for any of the following delinquencies on the part of the railroad company:

"First. Failing to take from or deliver at a post-office the mail, or any part of it, or to deliver the mail into a post-office immediately upon arrival, where the service devolves upon the railroad company.

"Second. Suffering the mail or any part of it to become wet, lost, injured, or destroyed, or conveying it in a place or manner that exposes it to depredation, loss, or injury.

"Third. Refusing after demand to convey mail by any train.

"Fourth. Leaving or putting aside mail or any part of it for the accommodation of passengers, baggage, express, freight, or other matter.

"Fifth. Leaving mail which arrives at the station before the departure of the train for which it is intended.

"Sixth. Failing to use the first practicable means of forwarding mail which is delayed en route.

"The fine will in each case be such sum as the Postmaster-General may impose, in view of the gravity of the delinquency, and will be deducted from the compensation of the railroad company." (As modified December 4, 1897.)

Senator CULLOM. Are any of those fines subject to remittal?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; when the railroad companies give satisfactory explanation, then the fines are remitted.

In my letter of instructions, from which I have quoted already, dated December 4, 1897, I say:

"The dispatch of mails is of such importance to the public that the Department holds that it should not be treated as of secondary importance to passenger or other traffic."

Senator ALLISON. It is stated by some of the people connected with the railroads that at junction points they are required to supply space for the deposit of the mails from incoming and for outgoing trains. Is there anything about that in your regulations?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes. The regulations say:

"At connecting points where the railroad stations are not over 80 rods apart, the company having mails on its train to be forwarded by the connecting train will be required to transfer such mails and deliver them into the connecting train, or, if the connection is not immediate, deliver them to the agent of the company, to be properly dispatched by the trains of said company."

Senator ALLISON. That is to say, if in a particular town one railroad station is within 80 rods of another, you require the same transfer that you do to a post-office or from a post-office?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; and the mails are to remain in the custody of one road until it transfers them to the custody of another.

Senator ALLISON. And that means that they must have space at the stations. Do you regard those regulations as within the province of the Post-Office Department under the law? You require the companies to do whatever you think they ought to do—you having that power under the law.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have that power under the law. (See Rev. Stats., sec. 161.) We have interpreted the law very stringently, and the railroad companies have not protested to the extent of refusing to perform the service. On the contrary, they have promptly complied with all requirements of the Department, with few exceptions. The courts have said that a regulation of the Department accepted by the railroads has all the force and effect of law.

The regulations further provide—

"SEC. 1024. Departure of mails at a late hour of night.—When a train departs from a railroad station in the nighttime later than 9 o'clock, and it is deemed necessary to have the mail dispatched by such train, the division superintendent may authorize the mail messenger or carrier to take the mail to the railroad station at such time as will best serve the interests of the mail service, and deliver it to the agent or other representative of the railroad company, who will be required to keep it in some secure place until the train arrives, and then see that it is properly dispatched."

In the same way mail arriving at a railway station after the post-office is closed at night is required to be kept by the railroad employees until the next morning.

Senator ALLISON. Kept at the station?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; and in safe custody.

Senator FAULKNER. Mr. Knott, of the Louisville and Nashville road, spoke of a number of places at which the railroad gave room at their stations for transfers.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; I will read the section of the regulations relating to that:

"The railroad company, at stations where transfer clerks are employed, will provide suitable and sufficient rooms for handling and storing the mails, and without specific charge therefor. These rooms will be lighted, heated, furnished, supplied with ice water, and kept in order by the railroad company."

That is the requirement with reference to the transfer clerks' rooms.

Senator ALLISON. Are there many places where these transfer clerks are kept?

Mr. WHITE. A great many in the larger places.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER (to Mr. White). Run over a few of the names of the cities.

Mr. WHITE. New York City, Boston, New Haven, Hartford, Springfield, Rochester, Albany, Syracuse, Buffalo, Erie, Cleveland, Toledo, Chicago, and so on.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Cities of that size?

Mr. WHITE. All those junction points.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have read those sections of the regulations in order to show that whatever is done in the matter of regulation of pay, the Government should keep before it all the while the importance of the service, the value of expedition, the proper dispatch of the mails, the extra expense attending the handling of our mails as compared with the expense of handling express or any other matter; and I think that these requirements, instead of relaxing in any sense, we are compelled every year more and more to insist upon and steadily increase, for the reason that the public are continually asking us for better mail service. Almost every day we get requests similar to this: "We are now only getting one mail in the early morning and one in the afternoon. Our business is increasing. The noon mail does not stop here. We wish you would stop the noon mail for us."

We immediately order the railroad company to stop the noon mail for the purpose of accommodating those people.

However much the business increases, we require the companies to take care of the service, and we must have discretion under the law, because it would be impossible for us to wait until the next contract period for improved mail facilities. We must have some general discretion.

Senator FAULKNER. Then, although you enter into a contract for four years now, the service may be immensely increased and the burden imposed on the road increased under that same contract?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Written contracts are not made with railroad companies. We simply state service upon a road. If it be a new road and we desire it to serve the terminal and intermediate offices, we state the service.

Senator ALLISON. The law and the regulations fix the method of operation?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Now, with regard to weighing, weighing occurs in the four sections of the country successively—one weighing each year—and that weighing fixes the compensation of the road for four years, regardless of the increase and regardless of the diversion of mail that we find it necessary to make to that road from any other road.

Senator FAULKNER. And regardless of the increase of service you may require during the four years?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; or of the increased expedition of trains, or for any other reason. All must be performed at the compensation fixed at the beginning of the four-year period.

Senator FAULKNER. Do you know of any route on which you decreased the service or cost of service during the four years?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am not prepared now to state the routes, but I think that there occurred a few exceptions in the last four-year period, by reason of the depressed condition of the country. It is, however, of such rare occurrence that we would have to search carefully to find them. The ordinary increase of the postal service has been probably 10 per cent each four years. [To Mr. White:] Shall I say 12 per cent each four year?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. CREW. It will average over that. Some sections show over 20 per cent.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That would be, say, 12 or more per cent in the four years. There are some roads which perform less than one round trip per day, that being at the maximum rate, of course. If there is a reduction we proportionately reduce their pay.

Senator FAULKNER. How often has that occurred within the last four years, for example?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That occurs occasionally in sparsely settled regions and in regions where they have snow blockades, or on small railroads where the service is reduced.

Senator PETTIGREW. Then the amount of mail doubles every eight years. Is that what you mean to say?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think we can safely state that as the result in many cases.

Mr. CREW. I would rather put it the other way, giving the figures of compensation of the four-year period for each section; that is to say, the four-years increase of pay in each case.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have those figures here.

According to this statement the increase of pay in the States included in what we call the first section, from the preceding term to the term ending in 1899, was 24 per cent in round figures.

The percentage of increase in that same section from 1889 to 1893 was 21 per cent; that is to say, the weighing in 1899 in the first section showed an increase of 24 per cent in compensation in round figures over the compensation of the preceding period of four years.

Senator FAULKNER. That is the New England States and down to West Virginia?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

In the States of the second section from 1888 to 1892 the compensation increased from 18 per cent to 20 per cent; that is to say, the increase from 1884 to 1888 had been 18 per cent, while from 1888 to 1892 it was 20 per cent. Then from 1892 to 1896 the increased compensation was 16 per cent, so that in these three periods we have an increase of 53 per cent altogether.

Senator CULLOM. Then it does not double every eight years?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; not in all cases.

The increase of compensation for the third section from 1883 to 1887 was 10 per cent, from 1887 to 1891 the increase was 19 per cent, and from 1891 to 1895 the increase was 16 per cent.

In the fourth section the increase of pay from 1882 to 1886 was 11 per cent, from 1886 to 1890 the increase was 24 per cent, and from 1890 to 1894 the increase was 12 per cent.

Senator ALLISON. That is the compensation, not the weight?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is the compensation.

Senator PETTIGREW. Will you furnish tables showing the increase of weights in those same sections?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I presented before you came in, Senator, a table showing the number of pounds carried per annum on a list of 20 different routes throughout the country, which list we propose to increase to 30 routes, covering practically the entire country, showing the reduction of cost per ton per mile from 1881 to the present time, and showing the reduction of cost per ton per mile for the several routes, between the years given in the table.

Senator PETTIGREW. On account of the increase of what?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Of weight tonnage. We give in one column the pounds per annum carried on these various routes and at the different periods, so that you can estimate the increase that has gone on in these periods.

Senator PETTIGREW. What are those, the large roads?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Some large and some small.

Senator FAULKNER. And he will add some other roads, I understand.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We will add at least ten more roads. The scope of the information contained in the table may be gathered from some of the headings which I will read. The number of miles of transportation, the number of pounds per annum, the cost per ton per mile, the average number of round trips per week and per day, and the number of post-offices on the route supplied by mail-messenger service, being over 80 rods from the station, as well as the number of post-offices on the same route not supplied by mail-messenger service, being less than 80 rods distant, etc.

Senator PETTIGREW. There are some points on which I would like some information. Let me illustrate: A car starts from New York to San Francisco, loaded with mail. That car passes over several roads and of course is credited to each road over which it passes—that is to say, its weight—is it not?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Senator PETTIGREW. How do you get at the through transportation and distribute it? Is each one credited with the weight, and does it get pay for it?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Each road gets a certain rate per mile per annum of its mileage. Perhaps I had better read a paragraph from the very carefully prepared statistics of Captain White, the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service. He says:

"By taking into consideration all the routes above mentioned, and making them overland routes between New York, N. Y., and San Francisco, Cal., we get these figures: The Government pays for the transportation of the mail $4,265,267.23; for the use of cars, $833,812.30; making a total cost per annum for transportation and cars $5,099,079.53. The average weight carried daily the whole distance is 100,295 pounds. The distance as figured from New York to San Francisco is 3,554.84 miles.

"By dividing the total cost for transportation and cars by 365 we get $13,970 as the daily cost, whole weight, whole distance. This divided by the distance (3,554.84 miles) gives $3.92 as the daily cost per mile whole weight. This divided by the weight carried (100,295 pounds) gives $\frac{1}{26}$ of a cent, being the daily cost per pound per mile. This multiplied by the distance (3,554.84 miles) gives $0.1392, being the daily cost per pound for the whole distance; that is, between New York and San Francisco. The figures for transportation alone would be for the daily cost, whole weight, whole distance, $11,685.66; for the daily cost per mile, whole weight, $3.28; for the daily cost per pound per mile about $\frac{1}{31}$ of a cent, and the daily cost per pound for the whole distance would be $0.1165."

In other words, if we include in that computation the post-office cars, the daily cost per pound is nearly 14 cents for the whole distance. Exclusive of the post-office cars it is nearly 12 cents a pound.

I have here the latest tariff rate of the Adams Express Company from Washington, D. C. I open it at Alabama. I find the rates from Washington to Abbeville $3.25 per 100 pounds, and to Abbeville Junction, $3.75; to Arlington, $4; to Bear Creek, $4.50; to Deer Park, $4; to Delmar, $4.50; to Guntersville, $4—all per 100 pounds.

Turning to Arizona, I find the rate to Alhambra from Washington, D. C., to be $15.75 per 100 pounds for merchandise by express. Here is another point—Canyon Diablo, $12.50 per 100 pounds; Yuma, $14.25 per 100 pounds, and so on.

Turning to Arkansas, I find various rates to various points—$4.75 per 100 pounds to one point, $5.50 per 100 pounds to another point, $3 per 100 pounds to another point, making, say, about an average of $4 per 100 pounds for Arkansas.

But taking up some of the points reached by the mail service, which I have just quoted, and comparing the rates, I find that from Washington, D. C., to San Francisco they would charge $14.25 for ordinary merchandise, and the rate to Valencia street station in San Francisco is quoted at $14.75 for merchandise.

Senator FAULKNER. Per 100?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; per 100. Then from Washington, D. C., to Sierra the rate is $22.50, and to Santa Rosa $15, and to Stewarts Point, Cal., $18.25.

The rate from Washington to Ogden, Utah, which is on the line I quoted from a while ago, is $10.25.

I think I shall just quote as I go along our own mail rates in comparison.

Our rate from New York to San Francisco—and I think it is about the same from Washington to San Francisco—is $11.65 per 100 pounds.

Senator ALLISON. As against their $14 or $15?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. As against their $15; or, to other points on that coast, still higher sums.

Now, take the route from New York to Ogden. The express quotations to Ogden are $10.25 per 100 pounds; to Frisco, Utah, they would be $12.75.

The mail compensation from New York to Ogden is $8.61 per 100 pounds, the distance being 2,196 miles.

I merely select that one point in Utah to show that the rates vary according to distance. We have a uniform rate for all distances.

Take up the next point and stop at Omaha, Nebr. We find that the mail compensation is $4.37 per 100 pounds.

Senator FAULKNER. From what point?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. From New York to Omaha, Nebr., the mail compensation is $4.37 per 100 pounds. The express charge is $4.25 per 100 pounds, and to Omaha Heights it is $4.75 per 100 pounds, against the mail compensation of $4.37.

From New York to Chicago I find the mail compensation rate $3.51 per 100 pounds. The actual compensation paid, as shown in the table that I have previously presented, is $3.51 per 100 pounds for 905 miles.

Senator CULLOM. Is that mail matter or express matter?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mail matter. Taking the Adams Express Company rates to Chicago, I find them to be $2.25 to Chicago proper; to Ashland avenue and the Heights, $2.65 per 100 pounds ordinary merchandise.

Senator PETTIGREW. How did you arrive at this compensation per 100 pounds for carrying the mails?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have previously read from the table the actual amount paid during the last fiscal year as ascertained and given in the table which I have previously presented. I have taken actual periods and actual distances.

Senator PETTIGREW. In answer to a resolution on the part of the Senate, the Post-Office Department stated that it costs 8½ cents a pound to carry the mail. Now, I can not understand how, if that is true, your figures as now given can be correct.

Senator FAULKNER. If there is any explanation of that, I wish you would put it in right here fully, because I have heard a number of Senators speak of that report, and I want to understand on what it is based.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is based on all classes of service. Here is a letter which was dictated by Mr. Madison Davis, the chief clerk of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, who had charge of those statistics, and sent to the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service:

"[Unofficial.]

"POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
"OFFICE OF THE THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
"Washington, D. C., December 6, 1897.

"Col. JAMES E. WHITE,
"General Superintendent Railway Mail Service.

"DEAR SIR: In compliance with your recent oral request, I send you the following estimate of the average cost per pound of transporting matter in the mails for the last fiscal year.

"The total weight of mail matter of all kinds passing through the mails during the year is estimated, upon the basis of an accurate calculation made in 1890, to have been about 527,516,000 pounds."

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That calculation, to which Mr. Davis refers, was made under the direction of Hon. John Wanamaker, when he was Postmaster-General, showing the mail matter passing through the country in one week—an actual weighing of all mails that left the various post-offices.

Senator CULLOM. Mr. Wanamaker was not Postmaster-General in 1897.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; this account was taken in 1890. Of course such a weighing would have to be done by special order. The account was taken in 1890 by Mr. Wanamaker. From that account, as a basis, these figures are made up.

Mr. Davis continues:

"The items of postal expenditure which enter into the cost of mail transportation are these:

Railroad transportation	$28,965,763.52
Special facilities on railroads	162,978.33
Star transportation	5,322,484.86
Steamboat transportation	401,262.95
Electric and cable car transportation	199,734.81
Mail-messenger service	951,624.29
Wagon service	705,260.25
Mail bags and catchers	343,324.59
Mail locks and keys	41,964.13
Repair shop for mail bags	7,749.24
Railway postal car service	3,361,313.76
Transportation of foreign mails	1,703,515.05
Additional compensation to Oceanic Steamship Company	80,000.00

"Dividing this total expenditure by the number of pounds of matter, we see that the average cost per pound is about 8 cents.

"The cost of collecting and delivering letters through the free-delivery system might not improperly be charged to transportation also; certainly that portion of the system which comprehends the collection of matter for local delivery might with propriety be included in transportation, and if this were done, the average cost would of course be more than 8 cents a pound. But as this has not been done in previous estimates regarding this matter, I have not done so now.

"Respectfully, yours, MADISON DAVIS."

That is the basis of the estimated cost, 8 cents per pound.

Senator ALLISON. That rate was not for railway mail service alone, then?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Not for railway mail service alone.

It has been said that Adams Express Company pays to the railroads for transportation 40 per cent of the gross earnings, and as they are willing to carry package merchandise at as low rates occasionally as the Post-Office Department, that therefore the Government is paying too much for the railway mail service.

That is an entirely incorrect view, and an incorrect basis from which to calculate. Adams Express Company, as I will show you, has very much higher rates prevailing for the Pacific Coast than the mail service has, notwithstanding the fact that our service is altogether better. But in addition to this, the Adams Company carries very valuable packages, for which it charges a very high rate of transportation.

Turning to the back of this book of Adams Express Company, from which I have already quoted some rates, I find in the tables a heading showing "a general scale of rates on currency and gold coin" to "railroad points within the United States and Canada." And running the eye along this list I see that "when the regular merchandise rate per hundred pounds is $15 and not over $15.50, the rate of pay per thousand dollars on currency and coin is $7.75 per $1,000."

Inasmuch as the express companies carry a safe in almost every express car, occupying little space, in which are many of these valuable packages, on which they charge high rates, and inasmuch as their compensation to the railroads is from 40 to 60 per cent of the gross earnings, it will be seen that the compensation they pay to the railroad companies can not be calculated upon the basis of a fixed rate, as we do in mail transportation, but on average rate for all classes and all distances.

The illustration given during the session of the medical convention at Louisville was faulty in that respect. As we have seen, whenever competition is extremely lively and whenever they find it convenient to carry a given bulk and weight, thus making use of the space that they have in the express cars, they will compete with the United States Post-Office Department and underbid us for short distances on very low class of freights.

In the case of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company the railroad gets 47 per cent of the gross receipts of the express company, and other railroads, I understand, get 40 per cent, so that they get a much higher compensation, I imagine, than they get from the Post-Office Department.

Senator CULLOM. Then the express service does compete with the mail service?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; from the fact that the Government does not make the carriage of second-class matter a monopoly, as it does in the case of the first-class matter. They can not compete in first-class matter because that is a monopoly, but for short hauls they can compete in second-class matter.

We carry second-class matter at 1 cent a pound at a great loss beyond the distance of, say, 323 miles, which our tables show to be the average distance of the carriage of mails in the United States. The railroad companies figure it at 448 miles. Mr. White's tables, which I accept, make the average distance 323 miles.

If we should take some leading roads of this country and attempt to estimate the compensation paid them for the railway mail service as the express companies do, it would lead to the following results:

An estimate of the compensation that would be paid to railroads on the basis of 47 per cent gross revenue—the Pennsylvania road basis.

Take route No. 109004, New York to Philadelphia, 93.65 miles. The annual transportation pay is $310,255.97; the average weight carried daily, 309,294 pounds; the daily average revenue on all classes would be $43,919.75; so that if we pay the railroad companies as the express companies do and return to them 47 per cent of our gross revenue on all the mail that is carried between New York and Philadelphia, we would have to pay them annually $2,062,305.90, whereas actually, as I have said, we pay them $310,255.97.

Senator ALLISON. For the whole?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; for the year about one-seventh.

Again, take route 110001, Philadelphia to Pittsburg, Pa. The annual rate of transportation is $736,586.83; average weight, 136,876 pounds. On the basis of 47 per cent of gross revenue we would have to pay them $4,831,568.06.

Senator PETTIGREW. On those routes you give the different classes, so that the figures can be easily discerned?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Senator PETTIGREW. But in comparing with express rates you must compare the revenue from that class of matter with which the express company competes. Of course we have a monopoly of the carrying of letters, and, like all monopolies, we receive a monopoly compensation.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have taken the first, second, third, and fourth classes, and I have taken 47 per cent of the annual average of the express companies' business.

Senator PETTIGREW. But your comparison is no comparison, because it does not apply to that matter alone for the transportation of which the express companies compete.

Senator FAULKNER. But is not that against the Government, when they put in what we are charging the higher rate for and for which the railroad demands the highest class of compensation because of the character of the service required of them—is not that a comparison against the Government?

Senator PETTIGREW. I say it is no comparison at all, because the comparison includes first-class matter, for which we receive a very heavy amount, having a monopoly of it.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. But the 47 per cent includes a high tariff on money (paper and coin) and valuables of all kinds, which the express company carries at very high rates of compensation.

Senator PETTIGREW. Then the proportion of these different classes would come in.

Mr. WHITE. Twelve per cent of that is first-class matter, 69 per cent is second-class matter, 14 per cent is third-class matter, and 4 per cent is fourth-class matter.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is all carefully and in great detail worked out in the accompanying paper which General Superintendent White has prepared leading up to this table. I only read some items from the table.

Senator PETTIGREW. But you put it all in?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I put it all in.

We have not been able to secure anything for comparison except what I have given here this morning, because express companies do not divulge their business.

We have consulted Interstate Commerce Commission reports, which are at our service, for the year 1896.

We have compared the passenger traffic as nearly as we could—the percentage of revenue with revenue derived from other classes of service. The Interstate Commerce Commission finds that of the revenues of railroad companies the average receipts from mail pay are 2.82 per cent and from express 2.16 per cent; from passenger traffic, 23.18 per cent.

Estimating the weight of a passenger at 150 pounds, as we do, the revenue railroads receive from the passenger traffic averages eight-tenths of a cent per 100 pounds per mile on the leading lines of the country, as compared with a little less than one-third of a cent per 100 pounds that they receive from the mail pay

Senator ALLISON. One-third against eight-tenths?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Senator FAULKNER. I understand that it has been stated by gentlemen on the floor of the Senate—in fact, a gentleman told me that if he bought a book from a publishing house he could send that book by express much cheaper than he could send it through the mails. But I am informed, whether that is true or not, and I so stated in reply, that as I understand that statement in reference to publishers the express people make a special rate and special arrangements with publishers much below the ordinary cost of transportation of the same weight.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. You are correct about that, Senator. The rates made to publishers and to news agents are much less than to others. So that if you buy a book of a news agent and let him send it by express it costs you less than if you send it by express yourself.

At 12 noon the committee took a recess until 1.30 p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I should like to continue the testimony I was giving when we took the recess, and possibly review just a few lines of it in regard to the comparative earnings of a passenger coach and a mail coach, inasmuch as we classify our railway post-office cars with passenger cars.

Senator CULLOM. Why do you do that?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Simply because we require them to be carried as a part of every passenger train, no matter how it is classed. If a railroad company should say to us that they have put on a fast train, consisting of so many cars, and that they could not take any more cars, we can say to them that they should leave off one of their own cars in order to carry a railway post-office car.

Senator ALLISON. Where railroad trunk lines have very fast trains, and it is inconvenient for them to run your cars on their fast passenger trains, do you then require them to run a special mail train which shall be of equal fastness, or that shall be as fast as the fastest passenger train? To illustrate what I mean: Suppose the Pennsylvania Railroad and the New York Central Railroad have a fast passenger train running to Chicago. Now, they must either put your cars upon that train or upon an equivalent train that runs by itself. Is that the way you do it?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have no right under the law to require them to schedule a new train exclusively "mail" without additional compensation, but we have a right to require that they shall not expedite passenger travel ahead of mail; and if they schedule a train for passenger traffic they must include in that train provision for mail, whether a car or a part of a car, as our need may be.

Senator ALLISON. What is the extent, if any, of the increase of pay because of a fast train?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. There is no increase whatever. It is only done now on the leading trunk lines when they find it to their interest to relieve the limited express trains by consolidating railway post-office cars into a separate train, and making the same schedule speed. That is correct, Mr. White, is it not?

Mr. WHITE. Yes; that is correct.

Senator ALLISON. That is to say, you would require them to carry this mail on their fastest train if they did not carry it on a train of exclusively mail or express cars?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; we find them, for instance, occasionally, at the request of newspaper men, taking out a train at an early hour in the morning, when it will not command passenger traffic. We forbid mail carrying on those trains, as it is a matter of special contract between the newspapers and the companies; but if we discover that there is a sufficient amount of mail to be expedited by that train and the company is willing to schedule it as a regular train, then we open it up for the reception of mail matter that may have accumulated from the preceding dispatch hour, whatever that may be, and we take charge of it as a mail train without additional compensation, although it may have been put on in the first instance to meet a commercial need.

The railroad companies never schedule a new train for express matter, but, on the contrary, they will carry as far as possible express matter on their night trains and carry it in bulk. They will not distribute express matter over ten trains a day or fifty trains a day. While they will not put on a train for express matter, they will do that for the Post-Office Department when the amount of mail to be carried will at all justify it.

In comparing the higher revenue of a passenger coach with the revenue derived from one of our very best railway post-office cars we think the comparison fair. As I have said, we discovered, on making inquiry through the Interstate Commerce Commission, that the average revenue from passenger fares in the United States is a little over 2 cents—$2\frac{1}{10}$ cents—per passenger.

Senator ALLISON. Per mile?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Per mile.

But not content with that, because that covers all the railways of the country, far West and South, and it would not always be a fair comparison, because it comes into comparison with the railways that are in the thickly populated districts, we have figures from the Pennsylvania and the New York Central and such systems.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company say that they estimate thirty passengers per car, and the average earnings from each passenger 1.84 cents.

Senator ALLISON. Per mile?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; per mile.

On that basis the revenue from these thirty passengers—one carload—would be 55¼ cents per mile. Now, compare that with the revenue from one of our railway post-office cars. As we have shown in the tables which have been submitted, the pay for railway postal cars per mile is 13.6 cents.

They will carry on the average 2 tons of mail matter—some 2 tons and some 6 tons. Two tons or 4,000 pounds is a large estimate, and is a little against the Government rather than in favor of the Government. Two-thirds of the space is fitted up with racks, cases, tables, and distributing accommodation, so that 4,000 pounds of mail will be a large average. They receive 6 cents per mile on 1 ton; on 2 tons, 12 cents per mile for the mail matter of that car; and 13.6 cents for the car itself per track mile, which is 25.6 cents per mile for the entire revenue derived from that car, which travels in conjunction with another car yielding them a revenue of 58¼ cents per mile.

Senator ALLISON. In other words, your statement from that data is that it is 25 cents for a car per mile as a railway postal car is loaded; that that car earns only half what a passenger car earns?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Less than half. According to their statements, which we get from high officials, their earnings are 58¼ cents per mile for a passenger coach, on the average.

Now, take the New York Central system as a basis. They do not estimate their passenger coaches to carry 30 passengers. They say 20 will be an average for all the cars they run over the New York Central system. We will, therefore, estimate it on that basis.

The revenue at the same rate we have given for the Pennsylvania road would be 38.8 cents per mile as against the 25.6 cents which we have shown they receive from the mail, so that, taking the lowest estimate that the New York Central has made, it is 50 per cent higher than the compensation they are receiving from the Government for a railway postal car on the same train, whereas the Pennsylvania revenue would be two and a quarter times as much.

The statement is, however, made to us that they would run a passenger coach if they could be guaranteed 18 full fares. Now, holding them to that, we find that the revenue of that passenger car would be 36.36 cents.

Senator ALLISON. For the passenger car?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; as against the 25.6 cents I have stated.

Senator ALLISON. Do you consider—I think you have already stated that you do consider—that method the best method of comparison as to cost and revenue. Why do you do that? Why is it that you compare this with a passenger car rather than with a freight car or an express car?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. For the reason, as I have stated in the early part of my testimony, that the Government, as a matter of fact, does require the very highest grade of service, and we do not wish to waive one iota of that. In fact it would not be submitted to by Congress.

Senator CULLOM. The people would not submit to it; they would not want a low grade of service?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No, they would not. We must have an unquestioned right to carry mail and run cars on the fastest and best trains.

While an express company may have a car that can be used for any other purpose when not used by the express company, we require the railroad companies to provide for us the best car possible, suited to no other purpose, costing some $6,000.

In all respects the expense of the railway mail postal service is as high as it is on the average passenger train. Therefore we do not see why the Government should not pay a fairly proportionate share of the expense of the maintenance and operation of the railway.

It was intimated they would take less; possibly they could not help it, as in the case of the land-grant roads, which take 20 per cent less. In all the States west of the Missouri and Mississippi rivers the railways, instead of having a surplus for distribution, have, in the last year reported, shown a deficit. They are running their systems at a positive loss. Passenger, freight, and postal revenues do not seem to cover operating expenses.

It is not to be expected that if we entered into the open market and contracted for the service we could get it for less than we are paying.

Senator CULLOM. From your study of this question since you came into office, and from your study of the charges on express lines, and of the cost of transportation of passengers, and of mails, on fast trains, state to the committee whether or not your conclusion is that the companies are not receiving for the transportation of the mails greater compensation than they ought to receive. Is that your conclusion?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That, in the presence of this committee, would be my conclusion, very clearly stated. I have not so stated it to any one of the companies; but, in the presence of this committee, I can state emphatically that I have been surprised to find that the rates allowed under the operation of the present law were less proportionately, in my judgment, considering cost of service, than the rates of compensation allowed them by express companies or passenger traffic, and in some instances by high-class freight. I affirm that we are getting mail carried in some instances lower than the high-class freight on the same line.

Senator QUAY. What would be the effect of an arbitrary cut in those rates?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think we should have so much difficulty in securing the proper expedition of mail and the proper handling of it that the public service would be very seriously embarrassed. I apprehend that for a time, at least, the great railways would submit to it in the hope that an appeal to Congress would in the near future remedy the difficulty, but the small roads which could not suffer a loss would, I am sure, be seriously embarrassed, and the mail service seriously impaired thereby.

Senator CULLOM. The postal service would be impaired, you say?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The exclusive mail trains would certainly be withdrawn.

Senator ALLISON. You would have to rely on slower trains?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Senator CULLOM. What do you mean by exclusive mail trains?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Those carrying nothing but mails.

Mr. WHITE. We have exclusive mail trains on a number of roads.

Senator ALLISON. Do they not carry express matter?

Mr. WHITE. The Northwestern does. But they put that on without any negotiation with the Government, and then offered it to us.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The regulations are that a railroad company shall not be excluded from carrying express matter, provided they do not overload the train.

Senator CULLOM. Do you think that there is any necessity for these exclusive mail trains over the roads between New York and Chicago, for instance?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Well, I would say no, because we do not require them. We have no means of paying for them.

Senator CULLOM. Then how do you get them?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. For the reason that the roads have such an immense volume of high-class passenger traffic that they sometimes find it convenient to separate mail from passengers and say to us: "If you will allow us to take mail off one train or two trains, we will consolidate on an exclusive mail train."

Senator CULLOM. Then they do not cost you anything?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Nothing beyond the regular pay for carrying the mails.

Senator CULLOM. Have you ever undertaken to get the railroads to carry the mails at reduced rates?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; we have done so; and we are doing that right along. When a new road is completed or an old one extended, and an application comes to us to start railway mail service upon it, we make an investigation, and if we find that the amount of mail carried is very small, with a few offices on the line that are very unimportant and that would scarcely justify us in paying a maximum rate, we say to such roads that we can not afford to pay it, and that if they will permit us to start service and wait until the next period of weighing, we will take action.

Or we sometimes offer them one-half or one-third or one-fourth of the lawful compensation until the next general period of weighing, when we could afford to start, under the law, at the regular rates. I do not know that there is anything further that I have to say. I shall be glad to answer any questions of the committee.

Senator ALLISON. Senator PETTIGREW and Senator FAULKNER may desire to ask some questions later. Let me inquire as to another point. What proportion of the mail matter transported is transported by means of postal cars?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is a very difficult question to answer. I can probably meet the inquiry by stating that we have 2,587 railway routes in the United States. Of that number 2,332 of them carry less than an average of 5,000 pounds of mail daily. So that only on 255 routes out of 2,587, or less than one-tenth of the entire traversed routes, do we carry over 5,000 pounds of mail daily.

Postal cars are seldom on roads carrying less than 5,000 pounds daily, but such roads, 255 in all, have two-thirds of all mail compensation. When it is said that it is not a fair comparison to compare a postal car, which will carry the entire average daily weight of mail on nine-tenths of the railway routes of this country, with passenger cars traveling over the same routes, I feel that I must take issue with the statement. It is supposed that it is not a just comparison on these few roads that carry storage cars. Those roads are few in number, and as a matter of fact do not carry a large proportion of mail in that way, because, as I have said, we make so large a number of dispatches in one day. Therefore, when I compared a full railway postal car to a passenger coach I did not consider it an unfair comparison.

Senator PETTIGREW. As to those railroad routes, I would like to know how many of them have postal cars and the amount of mail handled on those cars en route. Then from your reports we can see what the proportion is that is handled in that way. Of course, the aim of the Department is to handle the letter mail especially in the postal cars, because that is the mail in which great dispatch is required.

As far as possible, I presume, although I know nothing about it, the second-class, or bulky mail, which is the bulk of the business, is handled in another way, and is not handled over. I would like the information covering those points.

The mail on which we lose money is the second-class mail, and that, as it seems to me, is peculiarly an express business and has peculiar relations to the express business of the country—relations other than the mere matter of transportation. A comparison with that would satisfy my mind.

I presume you may get up parallels by which you would compare a high class of freight with the weight of this mail car, something like a comparison that on its face would seem fair and have a proper relation to this business; and I think it might come as near to making a good case with a comparison of high freight and a certain class of passengers; but the only comparison between a passenger car and a mail car is the cost of handling, so far as this question is concerned—handling the car when in the train. It seems to me that any other comparison is a very barren and useless comparison.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Of course I can take this matter up more fully at the next hearing if the Senator will indicate the questions he wishes to ask me. But I feel that the Railway Mail Service can make it quite clear to him that the service performed by one of the railway postal cars is of quite as high grade as that performed by an average passenger coach.

We require the mail to be put up in those coaches for a very large number of small offices, and it would be utterly impracticable to separate the first, second, third, and fourth class mail. They must all go into the same pouches for the same offices.

Senator ALLISON. And they all go into the postal cars?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; and not only so. I read in the early portion of my testimony the regulations that compel a train to deliver these pouches and sacks at stations where they make no stops, it being effected by the erection of mail catchers.

We require them, again, as I said, to receive and deliver mail by their own employees at three times as many post-offices as we receive and deliver it at by our messengers.

So that, in every sense, I regard the comparison a fair one between the passenger and the railway mail service. But while a passenger coach yields a revenue on the Pennsylvania system of 58 cents, our car only yields a revenue of 25.6 cents.

Senator ALLISON. Less than one-half?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Senator PETTIGREW. It seems to me that there are so many parallels between the express business and the mail business that information from the express companies would satisfy my mind and those people who think as I do about this matter better than anything else.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Leading newspaper men of Philadelphia have come to me with the question, "Can't you make a less rate than 1 cent a pound for us? Seventy-five per cent of our circulation is within a radius of 75 miles. We think 1 cent a pound too high for that."

I replied: "If the Government is disposed to change its entire system of postage rates and make a zone rate, as the express companies do, then we could probably say that we will carry your matter for half a cent a pound, because we could charge 1½ and 2 cents for longer distances." In that event we could compete with the express companies. But we must make a uniform rate. The express companies give back 47 per cent of all revenue, and for that reason there is no comparison. Until the time comes when we shall be permitted to charge on bank notes and bonds as express companies are permitted to do—charging $30, perhaps, for a little package—no fair comparison can be instituted between the express business and the Railway Mail Service.

STATEMENT OF HON. W. S SHALLENBERGER, SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL—Continued.

Senator QUAY. Have you anything further to offer to the committee, Mr. Shallenberger?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I should like to place on record a few words of explanation with reference to the tables which will be found on pages 126 and 127 of your printed record of these proceedings. The information there conveyed is rendered a little obscure by reason of the way in which the matter is printed. In the manuscript, as submitted to your committee, the routes were separated from each other by lines drawn across the page, and the omission of those lines by the printer renders it a little more difficult to observe the comparisons intended to be conveyed.

Senator QUAY. We may have those pages reprinted.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. There would be no difficulty in that case. The tables on those pages are intended to answer the question whether there has or has not been a marked reduction in rates of compensation paid to the railroad companies during the past fifteen years.

Senator CULLOM. Per ton or per pound?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Per ton or per hundred. That seems to me to be the question that presents itself to the country at large more than any other question.

Senator QUAY. The printed copy does not present that, you think, as clearly as it ought?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is in very fine print, and the periods are not very clearly separated. For instance, in the first route the second line of figures is separated from the first line by a blank space, whereas those two lines should naturally be brought together, in order that the comparison might be clearly brought out.

Senator QUAY. Both those lines belong to the "Concord" group?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes. In my written tables, as submitted to the committee, we had lines drawn across the page which separated the routes. The printer has left out these lines and brought the figures too close together.

Senator QUAY. But by the observance of a little care in reading they are plain enough?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Perhaps by the observance of care they are. I should like to make a little explanation of those tables. There are 40 routes included in the two tables on pages 126 and 127—20 additional having been added at your suggestion.

Senator QUAY. You added some to those which you previously presented here?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; we added 20 more routes. Among the routes in those tables will be found some of the largest in the country, such as the route from Boston to Albany, from New York to Buffalo, and from New York to Philadelphia; also some of the smallest routes in the country, as well as some of intermediate importance. We have covered the country at large, with those 40 routes, as well as we could.

Taken together we find the average rate per ton per mile in 1897 on the 40 routes named to be only 51 per cent of the average rate on the same routes twelve to eighteen years ago.

Senator PETTIGREW. That is owing to the increase in the bulk of the mail, is it?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Senator FAULKNER. And the automatic reduction under the law?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes. Any one of you can figure that from the tables.

Senator FAULKNER. That was a question I wished to ask you—whether you had done any summing up?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I did it last night, carefully.

Senator CULLOM. You had better explain how that is.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The tables on pages 126 and 127 show that the average rate per ton per mile in 1897 on the 40 railway routes named was only 51 per cent of the average rate paid on the same routes twelve to eighteen years ago.

Senator CULLOM. That is almost one-half less?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is almost one-half less. In addition to that, these routes embrace, as I have said, the largest in the country, such as the route from Boston to Albany, from New York to Buffalo, and from New York to Philadelphia, as well as some of the smallest, and fairly represents the different sections of the country. While the reduction may seem to be greater on some of the small roads than on the three largest which I have named, the increase in the number of trips per week has been much greater on the larger routes, and the speed of trains has been materially raised.

The average number of trips per week have increased from 15 to 30 on the forty routes taken together, while on the three I have specially named the average number of trips per week has increased from 61 to 167, and on one of the routes from 107 to 299 per week.

That shows that while the service has been performed in 1897 at 51 per cent of the average rate per ton fifteen years ago, the character of service and value of service have increased materially in the meantime, because of the extra frequency and speed of service.

Senator CULLOM. There has been more rapid transportation?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Senator ALLISON. I understand you to say that the percentage of gross earnings received by railroads from express companies usually is about 40 per cent, but that on the Pennsylvania Railroad they get 47?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That information is not stated by me as coming direct from the company, but I have been informed that that was the percentage. On the Southern I am told it is 40 to 55 per cent.

Senator QUAY. It is not official?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No.

Senator ALLISON. This 40 per cent of the gross earnings of the express companies is the price paid by those companies to the railroads for transporting their cars?

Senator FAULKNER. For transporting the cars of the railroad companies themselves. The express companies do not own the cars.

Senator ALLISON. For transporting the material in the cars, and the express messengers, etc.?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Senator FAULKNER. I do not see why they should object to showing their contracts.

Mr. JAMES E. WHITE. The general superintendent of the Southern Railway stated to me the other day that they received from 40 to 55 per cent of the gross receipts.

Senator CULLOM. Have you gentlemen of the Post-Office Department ever asked the express companies to let you see their contracts?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Not their contracts; but I asked the manager here at Washington to give me all the information he felt authorized to give, in order to enable me to make up my statements for presentation here, and he told me that all that he was permitted to give was the printed table of rates from which I read here when last before the committee, and such other facts as I might desire specifically to know, such as special rates out of Washington to any point. But he was not permitted to go back of that and give any information from the general office of the company as to what their contracts were or the percentage they were paying the railroads.

Senator PETTIGREW. I asked several of the railroads to furnish that information, and they said they would try to do it.

Senator FAULKNER. If they get different prices on different roads, I can see why they would not want to give the contracts; but if the rate is a general one, I do not see why they should object.

Senator ALLISON. Have you gentlemen any other matter not contained in this printed testimony that you wish to present?

Mr. QUAY. I will say of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that while he is comparatively new to the Department, I have been acquainted with him from his childhood. He was a gallant Union soldier, was wounded in the service, was a member for three or four terms of the other branch of the National Legislature, and is the peer of any gentleman in either branch of Congress, I think, in character and qualifications to deal with this question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I join in that eulogium, and I ask the Senator from what State Mr. Shallenberger comes?

Mr. QUAY. He comes from the State of Pennsylvania, of course. If there is an officer in the employ of the Government who would testify disinterestedly upon any question, it would be the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. As I say, the testimony of the Department, represented by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and of Mr. White, the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, who has been thirty-six years in the service of the Government in the Post-Office Department, lies in parallel lines with that of the railway companies.

After hearing the departmental testimony, on the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], who desired to compare some of the rates paid by the Government for the transportation of the mail with the rates paid by express companies for similar service, the president of the Adams Express Company was brought before the subcommittee. His testimony, which could in no way be connected in interest with either that of the Department or that of the railway companies, sustained the conclusions already derived from the testimony before the committee. I will ask that the testimony of Mr. Weir, the president of the Adams Express Company, be also inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF LEVI C. WEIR, PRESIDENT OF ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY.

The CHAIRMAN (Senator QUAY). You are president of the Adams Express Company?

Mr. WEIR. Yes.

Senator QUAY. How long have you been connected with the express business?

Mr. WEIR. Thirty-six years.

Senator QUAY. The committee are investigating the question of whether or not the Government is paying too much money to the railways for transporting the mails. In connection with that we thought it would be proper to ascertain what rates the express companies are charging. The Senator from South Dakota [Senator PETTIGREW] suggested that it would be well to ask one of the officials of the express companies to be present here and to give us such information as may be in his possession. Now, Senator PETTIGREW, Mr. Weir is here, and if you have any questions to ask, I have no doubt he will be glad to answer them.

Senator PETTIGREW. What I want to know is, what contracts you have with the railroads; also the weight of matter that you carry—that is, in the nature of goods, freight, etc.—the number of packages, and the number of packages that are considered valuable, such as jewelry, money, etc., and, as nearly as possible, the average length of the haul of these different packages. I do not know that the inquiry is such as that we are in a position to compel you to answer (the chairman can decide that), but I wanted to inquire whether you would be willing to furnish us that sort of information, or if you could do it.

Mr. WEIR. I doubt very much, Senator, if that information could be obtained, much less given. You have enumerated a good many things there, and I will answer them in the order in which they occur.

Senator PETTIGREW. Perhaps that would be as well.

Mr. WEIR. First, as to our contracts. There are no two contracts of railways and express companies that are alike.

Senator FAULKNER. You mean on any two lines?

Mr. WEIR. No two railroads have the same contracts with an express company. They differ in some particular.

As to the matter of the weight, we keep no record of the weight we carry.

Senator FAULKNER. Explain why that is.

Mr. WEIR. The compensation of railways is a percentage of the receipts. Therefore there is no necessity of keeping tonnage. In former years we did. We paid some forty years ago by tonnage.

Senator PETTIGREW. Are your charges not based upon the weight of packages?

Mr. WEIR. Yes.

Senator PETTIGREW. Then in that way you could give us the weight, could you not?

Mr. WEIR. I suppose there are millions of waybills that have to be consulted, and that information could only be got by inspection of every waybill?

Senator QUAY. You have no consolidation of those reports?

Mr. WEIR. None at all.

Senator PETTIGREW. These bills, or duplicates of them, come to the main office, I suppose?

Mr. WEIR. The originals do; yes. We have no duplicates. The original comes to the audit department and there they foot up the compensation to the railway company.

Senator PETTIGREW. You keep a record of the number of packages?

Mr. WEIR. No.

Senator PETTIGREW. Then you could only secure that information by examination of the waybills?

Mr. WEIR. Yes.

Senator PETTIGREW. In the same way that you would secure the weight?

Mr. WEIR. Exactly.

Senator PETTIGREW. Can you give the committee approximately about the weight?

Mr. WEIR. No.

Senator PETTIGREW. Have you any idea about it at all?

Mr. WEIR. No; not the slightest.

Senator PETTIGREW. Do you keep a record of the number of packages of valuable matter you ship?

Mr. WEIR. No, sir.

Senator PETTIGREW. Could you ascertain that by an examination of waybills?

Mr. WEIR. By taking all the waybills of the country; yes.

Senator PETTIGREW. Do you keep a record of the value?

Mr. WEIR. No.

Senator PETTIGREW. You have no record except the waybills to show the money you get?

Mr. WEIR. We have no record except those.

Senator PETTIGREW. Are you willing to furnish the committee with a contract with any one or any three of the principal roads of the country over which you send your goods?

Mr. WEIR. I should rather not do so, Senator; not that I would care to withhold any information from the committee that would aid them, but for the one reason that I would not care to have our competitors know what we were paying various roads, nor would I care to have some of the roads know what we were paying other roads. That is a matter of business secrecy between us.

Senator PETTIGREW. You can state in a general way what proportion of your gross revenue is paid to the railroads for transportation?

Mr. WEIR. That varies with every year, and according to the business of the country. Nearly all contracts with railways are for a certain percentage of the gross receipts, and, coupled with that percentage of the gross receipts, is a guaranty that the receipts to the railroad companies shall reach a fixed sum per annum. Now, in a bad business year the receipts would be so much less than that guaranteed minimum that the percentage of transportation would rise, while in a good business year the cost by percentage would be reduced.

Senator FAULKNER. I understand you to say that you have to enter into a contract with those companies—an annual contract, I suppose—guaranteeing a certain amount of gross receipts?

Senator CULLOM. To the railroad company?

Mr. WEIR. Yes.

Senator FAULKNER. And you take the risk, then, whether your receipts equal the amount of that guaranty?

Mr. WEIR. Yes; that alters the amount of percentage for transportation.

Senator PETTIGREW. When business is heavy and prosperous, the percentage is less.

Mr. WEIR. Yes; but it is never less than the 40 per cent; that is the minimum percentage. But by reason of the guaranty the percentage may run up to 50 or 60 per cent. It can never be less than 40 per cent, however.

Senator CULLOM. You pay, then, on the contract, 40 per cent to the railroads, absolutely, of your earnings. Is that what I understand?

Mr. WEIR. Yes.

Senator FAULKNER. Of the gross receipts?

Senator CULLOM. Yes; of the gross receipts.

Mr. WEIR. Yes.

Senator PETTIGREW. Do you pay any expense whatever before accounting to the railroads for 40 per cent of the gross receipts?

Mr. WEIR. Do you mean do we deduct anything from it?

Senator PETTIGREW. Yes.

Mr. WEIR. No.
Senator PETTIGREW. Nothing whatever?
Mr. WEIR. Nothing whatever.
Senator PETTIGREW. You pay to the railroad company 40 per cent of the gross receipts, and there is no item deducted before that is paid?
Mr. WEIR. That is right.
Senator CULLOM. What express company do you represent?
Mr. WEIR. The Adams.
Senator PETTIGREW. How much expense would it be to gather all your waybills and get this information for which I asked you?
Mr. WEIR. I suppose it would take 100 men three months to get it.
Senator PETTIGREW. Would you be willing to have that done?
Mr. WEIR. Personally I do not see any objection, but without the authority of my board of directors I would not promise to do it. I see no objection to it, however.
Senator PETTIGREW. Did your company furnish the information for the census authorities in 1890?
Mr. WEIR. I think we furnished some information. I am not certain about it.
Senator FAULKNER. Inasmuch as we have some one here who knows something about express matters, I wish to ask this question: Can you state to us the difference in the facilities and privileges enjoyed by the mail and by the express on these transportation lines?
Mr. WEIR. That is rather plain. The mail enjoys all the privileges they want. We enjoy all we can get.
Senator FAULKNER. What do you mean by that? Explain it that a "layman" can understand it.
Mr. WEIR. As I understand it, the Government has a right to dictate to the railroad that it shall furnish certain transportation, and the railroad does not question that right. On the contrary, the railroad says to the express companies that they (the express companies) may have such facilities as it (the railroad) may see fit to let them have. We have no right to demand anything except the prompt transportation of such matter as they (the railroads) accept on their trains.
Senator FAULKNER. Suppose you wanted, for example, to ship from New York to-morrow four carloads of express matter beyond the ordinary amount; would you have a right to go to the lines with which you have contract and demand that they take those four cars to-morrow morning?
Mr. WEIR. We would not undertake it without consultation with the railroad first, to know if they would carry the cars.
Senator QUAY. They have the option of carrying your matter or not, as they please, or when they please?
Mr. WEIR. Oh, yes. There is nothing stipulated in our contract as to facilities that we shall have, but it is generally understood, for illustration, that on local trains we shall have so much of the baggage car, but always with the reservation that if the amount of baggage presented should prove to be greater than the space allotted to baggage they would have the right to occupy the express space. If anything had to be left, it would be the express goods and not the baggage.
Senator QUAY. Then if they had a car full of baggage they would crowd you out?
Mr. WEIR. Oh, yes; but that does not occur very often in late years, because they know when they will be likely to have a great deal of baggage.
Senator PETTIGREW. Under your contract they carry your express messengers free?
Mr. WEIR. Yes.
Senator PETTIGREW. That is, the compensation for that is included in the 40 per cent?
Mr. WEIR. Yes; but we absolve the railroad companies from all liability for injuries to the men.
Senator FAULKNER. You become the guarantors for the men?
Mr. WEIR. Yes. We relieve the railroad companies from any responsibility of any kind or character, even for gross negligence.
Senator FAULKNER. Have you made any fixed or definite arrangements with them as to particular cars, or can they assign to you any cars they see proper?
Mr. WEIR. They assign the cars.
Senator PETTIGREW. You do not own the cars?
Mr. WEIR. No.
Senator PETTIGREW. Is your matter not carried in passenger cars?
Mr. WEIR. Sometimes; not always.
Senator CULLOM. Is there any other express company which owns any of its cars?
Mr. WEIR. None that I know of.
Senator FAULKNER. How do they require you to pack the cars—full, or do they give you the right to put in any particular car any quantity that you choose?
Mr. WEIR. If the average business warrants the use of a baggage car only, or the unoccupied space in a baggage car, that is allowed to us. If our business is greater than that, they will put on a car. If, now, the business decreases so that there is no necessity for a car, we will be relegated back to the baggage car again. We have no right to call for a car and have that car every day unless we can fill it solidly or have more express matter than a baggage car will hold.
Senator FAULKNER. What is the furnishing of a car that you use for carrying express matter?
Mr. WEIR. A lamp. I guess that is all.
Senator FAULKNER. Do they not give you a stove to heat the car?
Mr. WEIR. Oh, I had forgotten the stove. Yes; a lamp and a stove.
Senator PETTIGREW. You employ the employees of the railroads sometimes as express agents?
Mr. WEIR. Yes.
Senator PETTIGREW. Do you pay them extra besides what the roads pay them?
Mr. WEIR. In some cases; in most of the cases. In some of the cases it is stipulated by the railroad company that they will furnish the service.
Senator PETTIGREW. They furnish you storerooms, do they not, at stations?
Mr. WEIR. At some stations.
Senator PETTIGREW. What is the rule?
Mr. WEIR. At the local stations. At the terminal points we provide for ourselves or pay rental.
Senator PETTIGREW. That is, at the great centers?
Mr. WEIR. Yes.
Senator FAULKNER. What kind of rooms do they furnish you at local stations?
Mr. WEIR. There is not much necessity for rooms there. Everything is coming and going all the time. Everything is taken away promptly. Very little storage is required. It is more a matter of crossing the platform than anything else; but of course we have to have a case on the wall to hold our stationery and such things as that.
Senator PETTIGREW. At the Broad Street Station, at Philadelphia, for example, there seems to be a side track and a building for the accommodation of the express.
Mr. WEIR. We have a large warehouse there.
Senator PETTIGREW. Who constructed that?
Mr. WEIR. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company.
Senator PETTIGREW. You rent that of them?
Mr. WEIR. Yes.
Senator PETTIGREW. You pay them rent independently of this 40 per cent?
Mr. WEIR. Yes.
Senator PETTIGREW. That warehouse is on their ground?
Mr. WEIR. Yes.
Senator PETTIGREW. And they put in that side track to accommodate the business?
Mr. WEIR. Yes.
Senator PETTIGREW. They do that, I suppose, where there is a sufficient business to warrant it?
Mr. WEIR. If we pay for it.
Senator CULLOM. Do you have any idea of the total amount of business done by your company in the United States?
Senator ALLISON. Do you mean in value or in weight?
Senator CULLOM. The total amount of money received.
Mr. WEIR. I have not in mind, Senator, the amount now, but I should say that receipts from express business all over the United States would run up to probably $60,000,000.
Senator ALLISON. You mean all the business?
Mr. WEIR. All the business of all the express companies in the United States—fifty to sixty million dollars. That is not derived from any statistics, but it is my impression.
Senator PETTIGREW. As nearly as possible, will you tell us what the receipts of your company are?
Mr. WEIR. I could not tell you without looking over the books. If you will permit me to suppose, I should suppose that if the whole receipts were $50,000,000 our company would receive probably one-fourth of it.
Senator QUAY. That would be about $12,500,000?
Mr. WEIR. Something like that. The Adams Company and the American Company would run about the same.
Senator PETTIGREW. Can you tell me about how many agents you employ?
Mr. WEIR. I could not. I have all this information in New York, but I did not know what I was coming here for.
Senator FAULKNER. How many agents do you send in one car?
Mr. WEIR. One.
Senator FAULKNER. Only one?
Mr. WEIR. Only one; yes, sir.
Senator ALLISON. If you have two cars do you send two messengers?
Mr. WEIR. No, sir; sometimes we send four or five cars in charge of one.
Senator ALLISON. In charge of only one messenger?
Mr. WEIR. Yes.
Senator FAULKNER. Who delivers and puts into the car your express matter, and who takes it out and is responsible for it at the point of destination?
Mr. WEIR. We do. We load and unload the cars.
Senator FAULKNER. By your own agents?
Mr. WEIR. Yes.
Senator FAULKNER. The railroad company has nothing to do with that?
Mr. WEIR. No, sir.
Senator PETTIGREW. You are at the expense of transporting the stuff to and from the stations?
Mr. WEIR. Yes.
Senator PETTIGREW. Will you furnish us with a statement of the number of employees of your company, estimating as nearly as possible their service, and also the cost of transportation to and from the trains, the business done by your company, and send it over to us?
Mr. WEIR. That I could not do, because it would be impossible for us to segregate our wagon service to show how much of that wagon service was consumed in hauling to the trains and how much in gathering at the different places.
Senator FAULKNER. And delivering?
Mr. PETTIGREW. You need not segregate it.
Senator QUAY. What Senator PETTIGREW wants, I understand, is the expense of the service.
Mr. WEIR. Do you want that for our company alone, or for all the companies?
Senator PETTIGREW. For your company alone.
Senator FAULKNER. Also note down the number of express stations that that expense covers.
Mr. WEIR. I will do so.
Senator FAULKNER. When do you think you can have that for us, Mr. Weir?
Mr. WEIR. My general auditor has gone West, but when he gets back it will not take more than a day or two, I should think, to get that up. When do you need the information?
Senator QUAY. We would like to report this bill as soon as possible, so as to get it passed next week.
Senator PETTIGREW. So far as I am concerned, you could take up the bill without waiting for this.
Senator CULLOM. But you do not want the bill passed without your receiving this information?
Senator PETTIGREW. No.
Senator ALLISON. Without going into your contracts or asking you to disclose what we have no right to ask you to disclose, what, in your judgment, Mr. Weir, would be the average amount paid to railroads by your company (which I suppose would serve as a parallel for other companies) for the transportation of your material, whatever it is, assuming that, as you say, the gross receipts of all companies are $60,000,000?
Mr. WEIR. As I explained to you before, Senator, that average would vary with the business of the country, because of this fixed guaranteed sum in most contracts. While the percentage may be fixed at 40 per cent, the express company guarantees that that fixed 40 per cent shall yield a minimum sum of so much per annum.
Senator ALLISON. To the railroad company?
Mr. WEIR. To the railroad company. Now, then, if the business is light, just so much as you fail to reach that minimum guaranteed, just that much does your percentage of cost of transportation increase.
Senator ALLISON. It would not be easy to name, then, perhaps, what would be the average sum, taking a series of years together?
Mr. WEIR. No.
Senator FAULKNER. But you stated that it was never less than 40 per cent?
Senator CULLOM. But Senator ALLISON wants to get the gross sum.
Senator ALLISON. I want to get the gross sum. You may have explained, while I was out of the room for a moment, your view as to the relative amount received for express matter by the railroads, compared with the amount received for mail matter. Have you any knowledge about that which would enable you to express an opinion?
Mr. WEIR. None at all.
Senator ALLISON. Whether what you pay to the railroads for the service they render to your company is greater or less than what the Government pays the railroads for the service they render for the Government?

Mr. WEIR. No; I never heard or supposed that it was under discussion until this morning, or rather until Senator QUAY telephoned to me yesterday.

Senator PETTIGREW. Of course, what I want this information for is to make a comparison between the express business, including the compensation paid by the express companies to the railroads for doing that business, and the Railway Mail Service, including the compensation paid by the Government to the railroad companies for doing that business.

Senator CULLOM. When the space to which you are entitled, or which the railroad companies give you, in the baggage car is too small, are you then given an express car?

Mr. WEIR. Yes.

Senator CULLOM. When that is given to you, what proportion of that car is ordinarily filled by express matter?

Mr. WEIR. The actual working of it is that, first, if our business has grown so as to require more space, a larger baggage car is put on, taken from some other branch of service, which car is at that time ample for our business, and when that has become insufficient for our business they give us a small express car, which we can come pretty near filling.

Senator CULLOM. How much of a car is "a small express car"?

Mr. WEIR. Express cars run about 30 feet, 35 feet, or 40 feet in length.

Senator CULLOM. And that would be about one-half or one-third full?

Mr. WEIR. Yes.

Senator PETTIGREW. You go into an express car when the baggage car will no longer accommodate the business?

Mr. WEIR. Yes.

Senator QUAY. The railroad owns the express car?

Mr. WEIR. Yes.

Senator CULLOM. Have you any idea of how much more than 40 per cent the railroad gets out of it under certain circumstances?

Mr. WEIR. It is, as I explained, in proportion as the cost of transportation changes.

Senator ALLISON. Your express company does not own any cars?

Mr. WEIR. No.

Senator ALLISON. Is there a uniform rate for the rental of cars, where used?

Mr. WEIR. Rental by whom?

Senator ALLISON. I understood you to say—or rather, perhaps, I inferred—that where you procured a car, then, in addition to the rates paid to the railroad company, you also paid them for the car?

Mr. WEIR. Oh, no.

Senator ALLISON. They furnish the car, but require you to fill it, or approximately so?

Mr. WEIR. Yes.

Senator PETTIGREW. Whenever the business is too much for a baggage car, they put on a separate car—an express car?

Senator FAULKNER. Yes; he says it is a matter of gradual growth, first taking the ordinary baggage car, and when they have too much for that, then they take a larger baggage car and put it on the train instead of the smaller one, and when they get more express matter than that baggage car will hold, then they get a small car.

Senator PETTIGREW. A small express car?

Senator FAULKNER. Yes; a small express car.

Senator ALLISON. Is there any special sort of construction of an express car?

Mr. WEIR. No.

Senator FAULKNER. A stove and a lamp, he says, is all that it contains.

Mr. WEIR. That is the furniture of an express car.

Senator ALLISON. They are freight cars, are they?

Mr. WEIR. Well, they are on passenger trucks. The running gear is the same as that of a passenger car.

Senator ALLISON. So that they are a much more expensive car than an ordinary freight car?

Mr. WEIR. Oh, much more expensive.

Senator CULLOM. Was there not a time when some of the express companies owned their own cars?

Mr. WEIR. There is a tradition that some thirty-odd years ago, in antebellum days, there was some company that owned three or four cars. I think some railroad company had not the funds to build them.

Senator CULLOM. But nothing recently?

Mr. WEIR. Oh, no.

Senator ALLISON. I am sorry that I have not heard all that you have said, Mr. Weir, but let me ask, Do railroads regulate the speed of your trains carrying express matter—that is, can you force your material upon any train?

Mr. WEIR. Oh, no, sir; we have nothing to say as to the speed nor as to the train on which our goods shall be carried. That is a matter that the railroad companies settle themselves.

Senator ALLISON (to Senator PETTIGREW). Have you got all the information you wanted, Senator PETTIGREW?

Senator PETTIGREW. All I can get; not all I wanted. Mr. Weir has been very fair about it.

Mr. WEIR. Is it about the contracts that you are not fully satisfied?

Senator PETTIGREW. Oh, no; I should like to know the weight of packages and the number of packages.

Mr. WEIR. I see; you want to make a comparison?

Senator PETTIGREW. Yes.

Senator ALLISON. A comparison by weights?

Mr. WEIR. I do not believe that if we were to get out all the waybills for any period of time and aggregated the weights we could then make you a correct statement of the packages carried, for the reason that in going a short distance a waybill clerk is handed a package like that [indicating]. He knows that the charge on that package is 25 cents. It makes no difference whether it weighs 5 or 6 or 7 pounds.

Senator ALLISON. Or 1 pound?

Mr. WEIR. Or 1 pound. And there is no way of showing what the weight is.

Senator PETTIGREW. But your regulations would show that a package approximately weighing so and so would be such a price?

Mr. WEIR. Well, at any of these wayside near stations the charge on any package weighing, say, 10 pounds would be 25 cents, whereas a little package might contain perhaps a bracelet—so that any statistics I might give you would be indecisive. Of course, when it comes to a package of 10 or 15 pounds, or something that is going a long distance, where the tariff would have to be assessed, then there would be a correct weight.

Senator PETTIGREW. Have you ever made any calculation as to the average distance that express matter is carried?

Mr. WEIR. No.

Senator PETTIGREW. The Post-Office Department has made a calculation by which it estimates that the average distance a package of mail is carried is 328 miles. You have never made any similar estimate for your matter?

Mr. WEIR. No, sir.

Senator ALLISON. Take a large city like Philadelphia, for example, where there would be probably a considerable number of those little packages of which you speak. Those would perhaps go a short distance, or would you have a number going to San Francisco, some to Pittsburg, some to Chicago, etc.? What would be the approximate number of those little packages probably in an express car?

Mr. WEIR. They would almost altogether be included within a radius of a very few miles.

Senator ALLISON. Those little packages do not on the average go very far?

Mr. WEIR. No, sir.

Mr. QUAY. At the conclusion of the testimony of Mr. Weir, he adverted to rather a singular communication made by the American Express Company to the New York Central Railroad Company some time ago, in which the question of the relative cheapness of the express and mail service was discussed. He declined to give us the documents in his possession without consulting the American Express Company. Some time afterwards, however, the letter conveying the complaint of the American Express Company to the New York Central Railroad Company was transmitted to the committee, and is published in our report. I ask that it be read by the Secretary to the Senate. It is on page 162. The Secretary need not read the preceding letter, which is from one of the attorneys of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, who sent in the letter of the express company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, March 12, 1895.

DEAR SIR: We have of late had to call your attention to the difficulties which we are laboring under on account of your company not giving this company's business the expedition which the necessity of the case demands.

We think that, considering the fact that we paid your road last year within $38,000 of the amount you received from the Government for the handling of the United States mail, and further, that the service which you render to the United States Government is so far superior and in excess of anything that you do for us, we have just cause for complaint.

You furnish to this company for the use of its business between this city and Chicago but one train per day, which takes thirty-three hours and forty minutes to make the run, while you give the United States mail department two trains, one of which reaches Chicago in twenty-four hours and fifty minutes.

Again, if for any cause our train is delayed a few minutes it has to be side tracked to allow the mail to pass, we following on behind, and, as a result, frequently miss the western connection or are required to pay the connecting road the cost of running a special train, in addition to regular compensation, in order to make the connection, whereas if the mail is delayed the Department assesses a fine against you, which you have to stand.

In other words, while the United States Government has the power to, and does, dictate to you what service you shall render for it, and the compensation you shall receive therefor—and failing to meet its demands you are assessed damages—we, on the other hand, while paying more according to service for the tonnage hauled, have to put up with a second-class service, and just such as you choose to give us, and at your own terms.

In addition to compensation paid you, you require that we assume all risk of whatever name or nature against accidents to our men or damage to our freight, whether it be merchandise or money. And, further, we perform for you without compensation a very large service in the handling of all of your remittances, which in a year amount to a great many million dollars, assuming all risk therefor, and transport for you such matter as you may have to send by express to any point on the lines of this company. This service of itself is no small item.

So you will see that while you realize from the business of this company almost as much money, in the aggregate, as you get out of the United States mail, yet the service which you render for us is not much more than two-thirds as great, showing that the express business on your line is more valuable to you than even that of the United States Government; while we consider that, as a rule, the revenue to the railroad company from mail service, on account of its being a high class of matter, should be from 25 to 40 per cent more than is derived from express business.

In view of the foregoing, we can but conclude that if the handling of the United States Government mail matter is profitable to you at the price paid, you can afford to give this company a much better train service, in respect to time, than we are now receiving at your hands. Time with us is money, and if you can run a train to Chicago in twenty-five hours for the United States mail, at less compensation than you get for a similar train for this company, we see no reason why you should not make equally as good time on business intrusted to you by us. We presume that if we had the same power to dictate terms as the United States Government you would find nothing in the way of complying with this request.

Will you not kindly take this matter up at your earliest convenience, when we think you will see the justice of our complaint and apply a remedy, and very greatly oblige,

Yours, sincerely, H. S. JULIER,
General Manager.

Mr. NATHAN GUILFORD,
General Traffic Manager,
New York Central and Hudson River Railroad.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I do not know that I have anything to say in addition to what the documents read have conveyed to the Senate. The proposition of the Senator from South Dakota is simply, without any knowledge of the practical result of his amendment, while we are completely in the dark as to its effect upon the mail service of the country, arbitrarily to cut off $6,000,000 from the appropriation, and that at the very time when the Congress is organizing and providing for a commission to determine whether or not the railroads are receiving more than sufficient. That is all there is of it.

Now, if the gentlemen who represent the railroad companies, who are all men of high standing in business circles, if the officials of the Government, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, his chief of the Railway Mail Service, if the president of the Adams Express Company—if all these men are liars and have lied to the Committee on Appropriations, if they are all thieves and are banded together in a conspiracy to rob the Government of this $6,000,000, then the contention of the Senator from South Dakota ought to prevail and not ours. Their testimony is unanimous.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state that I have made no contention up to the present time.

Mr. QUAY. The contention of the amendment is that they are robbing the Government.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, under this bill we appropriate $30,500,000 for carrying the mails by railroad. In addition, we appropriate $4,000,000 for postal cars. I propose to address myself to the appropriation for carrying the mail by weight, and very slightly to the appropriation for paying for the extra service of railway postal cars.

In the beginning, after a careful investigation of this evidence and of such other evidence as I could secure, I believe that if the Government of the United States should pay what it is worth to carry the mail there would be no deficiency in the Post-Office Department. On the contrary, I believe we could also reduce letter postage to 1 cent per letter, and give to the people of the country this fifteen or sixteen million dollars which to-day we give as a gratuity to the railroads.

I am not alone in this position; neither is it a new subject. On the contrary, the question has been called to the attention of the people and of the Senate of the United States for years, and yet we have been unable for twenty years to secure any reduction in the pay for carrying the mails.

I read from the report of the Postmaster-General in 1890, in which he makes this statement:

> In the past twelve years—

That was eight years ago.

Mr. QUAY. Who was Postmaster-General at that time?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Wanamaker, I think; another citizen of Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. Pennsylvania does not seem to be very popular with South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I expected to see the Senator from Pennsylvania rise and eulogize this other citizen of Pennsylvania, who seems to have had a part in the handling of the mail.

> In the past twelve years no reduction of rates has taken place, though the freight rates upon all railroads have been steadily lowered. During this period the weight of the mails has largely increased. It is quite reasonable to say that the reduction in freight rates generally between 1878 and 1890 is not less that 20 per cent, and in many instances it is much more. The largest expenditure of the Department is for transportation. The estimates just sent to the Treasury for the next fiscal year cover $22,610,128.31 for railroad transportation alone.

Secretary Vilas had previously called attention to this question, and last winter when it was discussed in the Senate the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] made this statement:

> The fact is, Mr. President, that the great power of these corporations, who control everything, who are powerful enough to make and unmake public men, is so omnipotent that no executive officer has been found in the last twelve years, except in the single case of Postmaster-General Vilas, who has attempted to reduce the compensation for mail transportation, and within six months after he had left the Department every economy which he introduced had been wiped away, and they received not only what they had received before, but their compensation was increased, and never, during his long service in this body—the United States Senate—except in this one instance, did he know of a Postmaster-General who had made a bona fide effort to control this railroad extortion which everybody knows to exist.

Everybody does know it except the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. President, the statements which we took before the Committee on Appropriations were not evidence. Neither did we examine a single witness. In the first place, the representatives, attorneys, and officers of the railroads came before the committee and made statements, citing their own facts, and then from their own facts drawing their own conclusions; and we occasionally asked them questions. Yet that is the evidence presented.

If they did not make a case which would show that the railroad companies were getting too little for carrying the mails, the companies that employ them would have discharged them from their service. What more did we do? We took the statement of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and his clerks, and every word that they said is now embraced in the statements of the railroad attorneys who appeared before us, and I can not help but believe, after hearing the statements of the railroad attorneys, that they also wrote the report of the Post-Office Department. There is an absolute parallel. Every argument is the same. They follow the same line of argument. There is no variation, and I have reason for making this assertion independent of the parallel between the statement of the Department and the statement of the railroad attorneys.

For eight years previous to this Administration, through Harrison's Administration, J. Lowrie Bell was the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. He had been in the employ of a railroad company as freight or traffic manager and resigned a position with twice or three times the salary of that of Second Assistant Postmaster-General to assume the duties of that office; and when his four years expired and Cleveland came to appoint his successor, J. Lowrie Bell went again to the railroad company and is to-day in the employ of the company. His successor was Mr. Neilson.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator from South Dakota allow me to interrupt him? It is well to state facts. J. Lowrie Bell was out of employment by the failure of his road at that time. He was not in the service of any railroad when appointed, and he was the man above all others in this country who knew his business in relation to transportation.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is barely possible that at the time he was appointed he was temporarily out of railroad employment.

Mr. Neilson succeeded him. He was a railroad man. He was in railroad employ as a railroad superintendent, receiving a large salary, when Cleveland selected him. He resigned to become Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I understand that since he has departed he has again gone into the railroad service.

Last year we had an investigation before the Committee on Appropriations, and here is a part of the testimony. I read from the testimony taken before the Committee on Appropriations last year. Mr. Neilson was before the committee.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again? We had better confine these things to facts. Mr. Neilson is not in railroad service, and has not been. He is a patent lawyer in Washington, I think, at the present time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have understood that he had gone again into railroad service. However, I will read Mr. Neilson's testimony:

> You told us something of your business before you went into the Post-Office.
> Mr. NEILSON. Yes.
> Senator PETTIGREW. What was that?
> Mr. NEILSON. I was in the railroad service.
> Senator PETTIGREW. What railroads?
> Mr. NEILSON. I was on the Northern Pacific and on the Erie. I was on the Erie for twelve years and on the Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton for eight years.
> Senator PETTIGREW. Which road did you leave at the time you went into the Department?
> Mr. NEILSON. The Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton.
> Senator PETTIGREW. What is the full name of that road?
> Mr. NEILSON. The Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton.
> Senator PETTIGREW. What was your position on that road?
> Mr. NEILSON. General superintendent of the road.
> Senator PETTIGREW. Who was your predecessor in the Post-Office service?
> Mr. NEILSON. Mr. J. Lowrie Bell.
> Senator CULLOM. He was a railroad man, too, was he not, or had been?
> Mr. NEILSON. He is now the general traffic manager of the Central Railroad of New Jersey.

I think it is hardly necessary to comment further upon that subject, Mr. President. We will try to confine ourselves to the facts. I said I understood Mr. Neilson had gone into the service of a railroad company. If that is not correct, then my information was incorrect; but Mr. J. Lowrie Bell, his predecessor, did enter the service of a railroad company, and Mr. Neilson resigned a position as superintendent of a railroad company to go into the Department.

Now, what is there further? When Mr. McKinley's Administration came in it was not a good plan to continue the employment of a railroad official in this position. The attention of the country had been called to the fact. Neither was it necessary, as the facts show, for they had all the Department clerks, all the subordinates. They went up into Pennsylvania and got, no doubt, a very estimable gentleman, a cashier in a bank, perhaps clever, and a reasonably capable man. He has been captured, as any number of the heads of our Departments are captured by the clerks beneath them, as every Senator knows, and the information he has given us is the information of his subordinates, and it contradicts itself. It is information furnished him by these employees who were put into the Department when the railroad officers were at the head of it. That is all there is to it.

Now, let us see how it will bear investigation. The web spun by the railroad attorneys and representatives who appeared before us was ingenious, intended to cloud the situation, intended to befog the people. It is calculated that a layman can not understand it; that the terms used by railroad officers will be such that it will be difficult to get their real meaning. The same terms, the same effort to befog the situation, the same comparisons absolutely are used all the way through by the officers of the Department.

It seems to me that this is one of the clearest, plainest, easiest problems in the world to solve. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General says that the rates have declined 49 per cent in fifteen years, and then he proceeds to juggle with figures in order to sustain and substantiate that proposition. It requires no juggling with figures to ascertain whether or not the price for carrying the mails by the railroads has declined. All we have to do is to ascertain the amount we appropriated fifteen years ago and the amount we propose to appropriate this year, and then get the weight of the mail. It is a pure, simple question of division, and yet if anyone will read the statement of Mr. White, Mr. Shallenberger, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, he will wade through page after page of per cent, per ton, per mile, and space and motive power, and all sorts of stuff of that kind, finally to conclude, after pages of figures misleading, intended to mislead, that the rate has declined 49 per cent in fifteen years.

I sent to the Post-Office Department and asked them to furnish me the weight of the mails. I can myself get from the appropriation act what we pay for carrying the mails. That made it not a difficult question to solve. For instance, in the first place, in 1890 Mr. Wanamaker had the mails weighed, and he reports in his official report that they weighed 369,000,000 pounds. The total weight for 1897 was five hundred and twenty-eight million and some hundreds of thousands of pounds. In 1897 we paid to the railroads for transporting the mails $30,788,000.

Now, calculating that the railroads carried every pound of mail, calculating that the railroads carried all the mail, and the star-route and steamship companies did not carry any, and that no mail was distributed through the cities without being transported by the railroads—and there is, no doubt, a vast bulk of that mail—the cost per pound in 1897 would be 5¼ cents. It is a simple matter of division. In 1890 the cost for railroad transportation was $21,106,000. The weight was 365,000,000 pounds. Therefore it cost to transport the mails 5¾ cents per pound. So in eight years there has been no decline whatever in the cost of transporting the mails, and yet the Second Assistant Postmaster-General tells us in a statement which is published in the RECORD that the decline has been 49 per cent in fifteen years.

Let us go back fifteen years and see. In 1884, fourteen years ago, the weight of the mail was 196,000,000 pounds. Dividing the compensation received, $12,750,000, it gives 6½ cents a pound. There has been, then, according to his own figures, a decline from 6½ cents to 5¼ cents a pound, or a decline of a slight fraction over half a cent a pound. This decline was brought about in the way he states, no doubt. It has been brought about by the fact that the compensation decreases as the weight increases. In other words, where trains carry over 5,000 pounds a day, they get a slightly less rate per pound than where they carry less than 5,000 pounds a day. So this very slight decrease has occurred. I will ask to have these figures printed in the RECORD:

Year.	Weight of mail.	Compensation.	Rate per pound.
	Pounds.		Cents.

1890	328,000,000	21,106,000	5¾

I will also have inserted in the RECORD the statement of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, giving the weights, and then I have worked out the weight per day and the decline which has occurred:

*Not separately reported. On July 24, 1888, an act was passed by Congress whereby the postage on seeds, cuttings, roots, scions, and plants was fixed at the rate of 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof, and this transferred this class of matter from fourth to third class. The fact that the transfer was in an embryo state in 1888 will account for the consolidation of third and fourth class in this statement.

While it is to be understood that these figures are in fact approximate, yet the modes of ascertaining them were such as one could be able to say that they represent a fair estimate of the weights of mails during the years mentioned. The calculations were made from figures obtained in the various reports of the Postmaster-General showing the number of pieces of the various classes of mail matter during the years mentioned, and allowing a certain weight for each such piece. The average weight of each piece of mail matter was ascertained in 1890, and can be found on pages 51 and 52 of the report of the Postmaster-General for that year.

At the same time it is well to state that the above figures do not include franked matter, which, however, represents nearly 11 per cent of the whole weight; nor equipment, about 9.54 per cent.

It seems to me that the best comparison which can be made in this service is a comparison between what the railroads charge for carrying express and what they charge for carrying the mail. Express is carried on passenger trains entirely and exclusively. It is collected by the company and delivered to the train, the same as in the case of the mail. Mail is carried on passenger trains. Where the express business is small it is done in the baggage car, and there is where the mail is handled. I will corroborate this by the testimony of Mr. Weir.

There is nothing stipulated in our contract as to facilities that we shall have, but it is generally understood, for illustration, that on local trains we shall have so much of the baggage car, but always with the reservation that if the amount of baggage presented should prove to be greater than the space allotted to baggage they would have the right to occupy the express space.

* * * * * * *

If the average business warrants the use of a baggage car only, or the unoccupied space in a baggage car, that is allowed to us. If our business is greater than that, they will put on a car. If, now, the business decreases so that there is no necessity for a car, we will be relegated back to the baggage car again. We have no right to call for a car and have that car every day unless we can fill it.

The mail is carried in the baggage car, but if the quantity becomes too great to carry in a baggage car, a mail car is put on. Mr. Weir says:

The actual working of it is that, first, if our business has grown so as to require more space a larger baggage car is put on, taken from some other branch of service, which car is at that time ample for our business, and, when that has become insufficient for our business, they give us a small express car, which we can come pretty near filling.

The mail is carried in the same kind of cars also as is the express matter.

A great deal has been said about the difference between mail and express cars; about the fact that the mail car has a great deal of furniture. The question was asked Mr. Weir, and he said, "Yes, express is carried in cars built for the purpose, with passenger trucks." If it were not, they could not run in passenger trains.

Then Senator ALLISON asked:

Is there any special sort of construction of an express car?

Mr. WEIR. No.

Mr. FAULKNER. A stove and a lamp, he says, is all that it contains.

That was in regard to furniture. That is the furniture in an express car. Then Senator ALLISON asked:

They are freight cars, are they?

Mr. Weir answered:

Well, they are on passenger trucks. The running gear is the same as that of a passenger car.

Now, what more? I find in the railway report for the State of New York for 1896 a statement which I shall read. It gives the average cost of cars—first, passenger cars; second, second-class passenger cars; third, baggage, mail, and express cars. Baggage, mail, and express cars are placed under the same head as costing practically the same. These are reports from the railroad companies in the State of New York. There are eleven companies who report. The average cost of the baggage, mail, and express cars, according to this statement, is $2,323, and the express car and mail car are put under the same head.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him? The baggage, mail, and express car is all one car. It has a compartment for mail, a compartment for baggage, and a compartment for express matter in the same car.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I understand that perfectly. They explain that that is the case where their business is not great enough to warrant a separate car for the express matter and a separate mail car.

Mr. SEWELL. There is a separate space, perhaps 10 feet by 12, allotted to the mail department for the messenger and the boxes, and it makes no difference whether the car carries 5 or 500 pounds of mail.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is stated by everybody. All that is in the testimony.

Mr. SEWELL. It limits the cost of transportation——

Mr. PETTIGREW. I must decline to be interrupted by the Senator for the purpose of making a speech. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator make a reply to me after I conclude.

Under the head, I say, of the average cost of cars the New York railroads, eleven of them, according to the railway report of New York for 1896, put baggage cars, mail cars, and express cars under the same head, and the average cost per car was $2,323 each.

Some of them cost as low as $1,500, and the highest is $3,600. The Postmaster-General for the purpose of aggravating the importance of the mail cars testifies in his statement that they cost $6,000 each. All the way through his testimony contains statements of that sort for the purpose of misleading, and (I will leave it to any Senator who will read his statement) for the plain and apparent purpose of making out a case for the railroads.

I wish to have this statement printed in the RECORD. It contains a statement not only of the average cost of these cars, but also their life; that is, the number of years they will last.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. PETTIGREW. According to the statement of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and of Mr. White, Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, we paid last year for the use of these cars $6,250 apiece, and they cost $2,323. Yet they talk about the wonderful service they are furnishing. I do not intend to go into that branch of the subject, however, but I do intend to hold this discussion down to the question of the compensation for the mail that is carried by weight. Why? Because, eliminating from the discussion the postal cars, the business becomes an express business, and the question whether they have too much or too little pay for hauling the cars is a question that is not allied to the compensation for transporting the mails for this reason:

The compensation for transporting the mail by the pound was fixed before there were scarcely any postal cars in the service. Afterwards we added that facility. When we added it we fixed the compensation, and you can depend upon it, Mr. President, if it was not ample, and more than ample, the railroads would never have accepted it. They did accept it, and that is another branch of this case. For the purpose of eliminating that question, in order to make a comparison between the mail service and the express service, I discuss simply the compensation for transporting the mail, and not for the extra facilities.

Let us see what further parallel there is. Express messengers are carried free. So are the route agents in the Railway Mail Service. In many cases the baggage men handle the mail. So do they handle the express. Mr. Weir testifies what I shall read. I asked him this question:

> You employ the employees of the railroads sometimes as express agents?
> Mr. WEIR. Yes.
> Senator PETTIGREW. Do you pay them extra besides what the roads pay them?
> Mr. WEIR. In some cases; in most of the cases. In some of the cases it is stipulated by the railroad company that they will furnish the service.

In this case I suppose that the Government pays nothing extra when the railroad official handles the mail, and there is a slight variation from the parallel, but in some instances they handle the express matter without any extra compensation.

Mr. Weir says the railroads furnish storehouses or store express matter in their stations—that they furnish the space. So do the railroad companies store the mail. There is an exact parallel in that case except that at great terminal points the railroad puts in side tracks for the express company and builds a warehouse, while at the great terminal points the Government of the United States takes the mail direct from the cars to the post-offices without any expense whatever to the railroad company.

Well, they think there is a wonderful difference in furniture; that an express car has a lamp and a stove. Is this a wonderful difference? It was so slight that the New York railroads did not think it worth while to mention it in estimating or stating the average cost of cars. What is the difference in the furniture of mail and express cars? It is pigeonholes and a rack upon which to hang mail bags. That is the great difference so much talked about in the statements before the committee between an express car and a mail car.

The express matter is always taken, as I understand it, from the railroad by the express company and delivered to the railroad by the express company, but the mail is not always handled in that way. Where the post-office is within 80 rods of the depot the mail is delivered by the railroad company. Where the distance is greater than 80 rods it is handled by the Government. At all the great stations where it is expensive to handle the mail it is more than 80 rods from the depot. In every great city—in every one, without exception—the Government handles the mail to and from the railroad trains.

Here is an item, then, the cost of transporting the mail from train to depot or to the post-office at the small station, where the parallel is broken. But what does it amount to? On the Louisville and Nashville road it costs the Government, on an average, $46 a year to carry the mail from the train to the post-office and back for every single station, except the eight great cities, where the compensation of course is very much larger. In other words, for 221 stations the Government pays an average of $46 a year for transporting the mail from the station to the post-office where the distance is over 80 rods.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion to him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator stated that the express companies carry their express matter from the cars. They not only do that, but they send around the town and gather it up and then send it to the cars. So they do more.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is a subject I will get to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suppose the Senator from South Dakota means that the $46 at each of those stations he mentions on the Louisville and Nashville is paid by the Government not to the railroads, but to the messenger service.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Government hires its own messengers to carry the mail to and from the depot for 229 post-offices on the Louisville and Nashville road, and for supplying those post-offices it pays about $58,000.

Mr. FAULKNER. That is to the messenger service, not to the railroads.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not to the railroads. I am going to show what the compensation is that the railroads have to pay for this service. There are 229 post-offices where the Government supplies the service from the train to the post-office. Eight of these are great cities like Louisville, Cincinnati, Mobile, New Orleans, Lexington, Nashville, Memphis, Evansville, all of them large cities, and in those great cities the compensation is between $46,000 and $48,000 per year for messenger service, but for the 221 post-offices it is $10,300 a year, or $46 for each office. Now, why is it so small? Because a great many of these post-offices carry the mail for nothing; the postmaster performs the service.

In the United States there are 20,000 post-offices which are supplied by the railroads and 7,000 which are supplied by the Government. Taking the Louisville and Nashville road as the data from which to make our calculation, and it is the only data we have, for it is the only road that gave us this evidence, it appears that if the Government should pay the same for all the post-offices, for all of the 7,000, that it pays in this case for the rate per office for the 229 offices on the Louisville and Nashville road, it is $252 per year.

That embraces the $16,000 that is paid in Cincinnati and the $48,000 which is paid in the nine offices. It would, therefore, make the compensation the Government pays for transporting the mail from the railroad to the post-offices in the 7,000 stations $1,778,000, while the Second Assistant Postmaster-General testifies that we pay over $1,000,000 for the service. Therefore the average in the case of the Louisville and Nashville road is very much higher than the average for the 7,000 offices.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from South Dakota ought to be fair to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. That officer said it was over a million. He did not say how much. He had no figures, but he said they paid over a million for the 7,000 post-offices.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. FAULKNER. He had no figures.

Mr. PETTIGREW. No. It was not hard to get figures, I suppose. But if it is over a million dollars, it naturally would be supposed that an officer would state somewhere near the figure. Nearly two million is not very close to one million.

However, I am using this simply as a matter of comparison. I say that according to these figures the rate is too high. If it is only over a million, these figures work out $1,778,000, and that places the country offices outside of the great cities at $46 per annum. Therefore, figuring the 20,000 offices which the railroads supply at $46 per annum—and many of those are simple catch stations, where the train does not stop at all, but catches a bag as it passes—the compensation the railroads pay for getting the mail from their trains to the post-offices is only $920,000; and yet all through this testimony they make a great ado over this transportation of the mail from the railroad to the post-offices. Out of a total compensation carried by this bill of $34,500,000, $30,500,000 for the weight of the mail and $4,000,000 for the cars, they make a great fuss about this $920,000 which they pay for carrying the mail from the cars to the post-offices.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to understand the Senator there. I do not exactly catch the way in which he reached his conclusion. The evidence before us was that the cost of this service, in the opinion of the Department, was $3,000,000 to the railroads; but they claim, and in the testimony of one of the witnesses for the railroads it was claimed, that it cost four million five hundred and some odd thousand dollars. Figuring on the two hundred and odd routes on the Louisville and Nashville, I do not see how it is possible that 20,000 would cost so much less than 7,000 for the Government.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. Shallenberger stated the cost——

Mr. FAULKNER. His opinion was that it cost about $3,000,000.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Here is just what he did say:

> Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; but I know it costs us over $1,000,000 for the 7,000 post-offices. On that basis it would be $3,000,000 per year or over for the railroads. They estimate it at over $4,000,000 a year.

That is the kind of testimony they furnish us—no data, no figures—simply a conclusion; and whose conclusion is it? Simply the railroads' and nobody else's conclusion; for, taking the Louisville and Nashville road as data, leaving out the great stations, 221 post-offices cost $46 apiece. Now, as the railroad company never carries the mail in the great cities at all from the post-office to the cars, you must leave out the great cities. They are left out, and not one of them is included in the 20,000 offices which they supply. Figuring those 20,000 offices at $46 apiece, you have $920,000 that it costs them to transport the mail from the station to the post-office. If this is not correct, it is all the data they furnished us. We have nothing but the material that they furnish us upon which to draw our conclusion.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? This is a subject about which I know absolutely nothing, but it has occurred to me that it is entirely competent for the Senate to make an exhaustive investigation of the subject, to authorize a committee or a commission to explore it thoroughly, to send for persons and papers and put witnesses under oath, and be able to lay before the Senate the exact facts. Has that been done at any time?

Mr. FAULKNER. We have provided in this bill for that very investigation.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not know that it had been provided for.

Mr. FAULKNER. It has been adopted.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Last year the Committee on Appropriations brought in here a provision of that sort and the Senate struck it out at the instigation of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I think, have never made this investigation. They are too busy, as our committees are, to enter into an elaborate and extensive investigation of these questions; and although the clamor has been here constantly for years and years, we are unable to get the investigation. The provision we have inserted here will go to a conference and perhaps be stricken out. In the meantime are there facts enough to warrant us in reducing this compensation?

Now, that is the question. Are there facts enough? To my mind they are ample. There has been no reduction by law for twenty years. It is fair to compare the compensation these railroads receive with the compensation they charge the express companies, because there is a complete parallel almost between the two services. When I asked these railroad lawyers who came before us to furnish their express contracts, they all promised to do it, and not one of them did it. One of them said: "Give us a week and we will furnish them." We gave them a week. In fact, this was on the 23d day of last month.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the Senator is not quite stating the fact as to the promise on the part of the companies to furnish the contracts. I think the gentlemen who were before us stated that they were not authorized to promise any such thing, but they would be glad to do it if those in authority were willing.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Some of them said they would do it, and some of them made the statement the Senator makes. However, I care nothing about that question. They did not do it. We could not get it. What I wanted was the weight of the express carried and the compensation to the railroads for carrying it, and I could not get it from anybody, as Senators know. They would not testify. They talked about disclosing their business. Mr. Weir talked about letting other companies know what they were doing; and the railroads would not furnish it and did not furnish it. I could not get the information.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from South Dakota will permit me, I will state that the testimony is conclusive from all sources that the minimum price paid to the railroads by the express company is 40 per cent of the gross receipts, and that it varies from that up to 60 per cent. Now, that is conclusive; and the Senator ought to do justice to the president of the Adams Express Company, who said that he did not think it was fair to ask him, in a collateral investigation he had no interest in, to show his contract. He stated to the committee that there were not two contracts of the same character; that the compensation was not the same with any two roads; and that it would disclose entirely the private business of that company in a matter in which they had no interest before Congress.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Well, Mr. President, it matters not what explanations are made, we did not get the information. We tried to get it. Now, how are we going to determine it? The express matter is carried on the same train with the mail. It is carried for 40 per cent of the gross receipts of the express company. For that 40 per cent they carry their express agents free. Where an express agent does not go, sometimes they hire and employ the baggageman of the railroad company. Sometimes they pay him, and sometimes their contract provides that the railroad company shall pay him and his services shall be given to the express company for nothing. Therefore we have a fair basis of comparison.

But fortunately, in 1890, the express companies furnished this information for the census. I asked Mr. Weir if he furnished the figures in the census report for the Adams Express Company in 1890, and he said he believed he did. So we have this authenticated in the figures of the express business of this company for 1890. Now, let us see what they say:

> The number of express freight waybills was 44,475,000.
> Packages carried, not valuable, like second-class mail matter, 98,118,000.
> Weight of the same in pounds, 3,292,000,000.
> Number of valuable waybills, 11,614,000.
> Number of valuable packages, 17,258,000.
> Number of money orders, 4,598,000.

Now, let us see. The express companies carried 3,292,000,000 pounds of express matter, not counting the 17,000,000 packages of valuable matter. Giving them the benefit as far as weight is concerned and throwing in the 17,000,000 packages of valuable matter, we find that they paid the railroads for transporting everything $19,327,000, which is 5¾ mills per pound. In other words, the railroad companies received for transporting express matter in 1890 one-tenth what we paid per pound for carrying mail matter last year, giving them the benefit, throwing in the weight of all the 17,000,000 of valuable packages. The express companies paid a little less than 6 mills per pound, while the United States paid for carrying the mails a little less than 6 cents per pound, or $30,000,000 for a service which the railroads would have done for the express companies for $3,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield for one moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2680) amending "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, not to lose its place at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator, if the Senator from South Dakota will pardon me for a moment, to the fact that a day or two ago the Senate made a special order for Monday. I do not know that this will interfere with the interstate commerce arbitration bill. Will that displace this on Monday?

Mr. FAULKNER. No; I suppose it would not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The railroad attorneys say the reason why there is no comparison between the express business and the mail business is because the express is in bulk, large packages, carloads.

In the statement made by the Louisville and Nashville road, which was read and placed in the RECORD, there is this statement:

> There are probably more apparent points of comparison between the express service and the mail service than between any other, but even here there are only a few common factors.

Then what does Mr. Knott say?

> To relieve our minds of the erroneous impression that there is some common standard by which the express service and the mail service may be measured we have only to consider the fact that much of the express service is in fact simply the expeditious movement of perishable freights, being solid carloads of fruits or vegetables, sometimes solid through carloads of fine stock, and not infrequently solid carloads of merchandise.

Now, let us see. According to the census report of 1890, the express companies of this country sent 115,000,000 packages, and the total weight of all the packages, counting all the packages and not counting 17,000,000 of them as weighing anything because that weight is not given, dividing the 3,292,000,000 pounds of weight by the 115,000,000 packages, we find that the average weight of express packages is 28 pounds. Yet we are regaled with this statement, which is deemed worthy to be put into the RECORD upon which to rest their case, that most of the express matter is in carload lots—great quantities of vegetables and fruit. Why, Mr. President, fruit does not go as express matter, and this railroad manager knows it. It goes as fast freight. Fruit and perishable stuff comes to the North as fast freight; not as express. Occasionally a little is sent by express, but the average weight of express packages sent in this country in 1890 was 28 pounds.

Again we have a parallel between the mail and the express, and what is more, the compensation received for these express packages was 16¼ cents apiece. Yet you will find all through the statements of these lawyers that they never carry a package for less than 25 cents by express. Then proceed to figure what the result would be if they got 25 cents apiece for all the packages they carried. Here, then, is a service done on the same train, done in the same manner, for which the Government of the United States pays 5½ cents per pound and the express companies pay 5⅝ mills.

In other words, we pay ten times as much per pound for carrying the mails, to say nothing about the railway postal car service, as the express companies pay; and yet they insist that we are not paying enough. The fact is, we are paying ten times too much. If we paid the $4,000,000 for the use of the cars and $3,000,000 for the weight of the mail, we would pay for the weight of the mail just in proportion to its weight what the express companies are paying to-day. But granting them five times that and paying them $15,000,000, then there is a saving of $15,000,000 to the Government and the Treasury, and we would pay five times what the express company pays for its transportation.

The Second Assistant Postmaster-General takes up the question of paying for hauling passengers, and he says that is the basis of comparison. Then he proceeds to say that on the Pennsylvania Railroad they carry thirty passengers to a car at 2 cents a mile per passenger. The railroad company would receive 60 cents a car per mile for carrying that car with those passengers, while we only pay them, he says, 26 cents for carrying the mail car, and therefore the compensation is too little. The whole statement that is made is full of just such parallels as that.

The interstate-commerce report shows that the average train load of passengers in this country is only 45, with 5 cars in a train, which would be 9 persons to a car, and therefore, at 2 cents a mile, they would get 18 cents a mile, while we pay, according to his own figures, 26 cents. I say that is the sort of stuff the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, coached by the railroad employees in the Department, has retailed to us as evidence in this case.

You will find on certain railroads in this country that they carry 40 people to a car. Is that any basis for calculation? Another thing. The compensation for carrying passengers is put not only for carrying the passenger over a mile of track, but for getting the business, soliciting, station agents, passenger stations, advertising, railroad offices, and all the attendant expenses; more than half of all the revenue received goes to getting the business, and yet the Second Assistant Postmaster-General stands up before our committee and tells us that that is the only sort of service with which you can draw a correct parallel. Aside from that, incident to the passenger service is the baggage car. He did not take that into consideration. They have to haul, incident to the passenger service, a dining car, and incident to it also is the sleeping car.

He goes on then to isolate a car on the Pennsylvania Railroad, and says they can carry 30 passengers, which would be a little less than 2 cents a mile for a passenger, which would be 58 and some fractions of a cent per mile, while we pay only 26 cents. That sort of evidence, given intentionally and purposely to deceive the committee, is the basis upon which the majority of the committee make this report.

Now, let us see. The Government charges 1 cent a pound for second-class mail, and we pay the railroad companies about 5½ cents for carrying this same mail. The express companies compete with the Government for a distance of 500 miles all over the United States at 1 cent per pound. In other words, they will carry express packages for less than a cent a pound and drive the Government out of the business; and that includes their compensation from domicile to domicile, from house to house, over a distance of 500 miles.

The express companies will take freight, take packages, take express business, for 1 cent a pound. What is their rate? From New York to New Haven it is three-fourths of a cent per pound; to Boston it is 1 cent; to Philadelphia, three-fourths of a cent; to Cleveland, 1½ cents; to Cincinnati, 2 cents, while on the long distances they can not compete.

Here is the cause of the effort to increase the pay for second-class mail matter. If they could increase that compensation and make the Government charge more for second-class matter, the three hundred and some odd million pounds of mail matter which goes as second class would be driven to the express companies and would thus enlarge their receipts. So they made the effort to secure the increase of compensation for second-class mail matter.

The Government can carry second-class mail matter at a profit at 1 cent a pound all over the United States, without reference to distance, if we only pay the railroad companies what the express companies pay them for doing their service.

This concession ought to be made. We ought to reduce the rate to the railroads on second-class matter, so that from station to station throughout the United States, without reference to distance, we would pay less than 1 cent a pound, or six-tenths of a cent, which the express companies pay. I say this for the reason that the express companies now compete with the Government within a radius of 500 miles. The average distance the mail is carried is 328 miles. Therefore, without reference to distance, there is a profit in carrying the mail at 1 cent a pound if we pay the railroad companies only what the express companies pay.

But let us see what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General gave us on this subject. It is rather interesting, and I call especial attention to this branch of his testimony. He first goes on to say:

> Each road gets a certain rate per mile per annum of its mileage. Perhaps I had better read a paragraph from the very carefully prepared statistics of Captain White, the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service. He says:
> "By taking into consideration all the routes above mentioned and making them overland routes between New York, N. Y., and San Francisco, Cal., we get these figures: The Government pays for the transportation of the mail $4,265,267.23; for the use of cars, $833,812.30; making a total cost per annum for transportation and cars, $5,099,079.53. The average weight carried daily the whole distance is 100,295 pounds. The distance as figured from New York to San Francisco is 3,554.84 miles. By dividing the total cost for transportation and cars by 365 we get $13,970 as the daily cost, whole weight, whole distance.
> "This divided by the distance (3,554.84 miles) gives $3.92 as the daily cost per mile whole weight. This divided by the weight carried (100,295 pounds) gives $\frac{1}{1000}$ of a cent, being the daily cost per pound per mile. This multiplied by the distance (3,564.84 miles) gives $0.1392, being the daily cost per pound for the whole distance; that is, between New York and San Francisco. The figures for transportation alone would be for the daily cost, whole weight, whole distance, $11,685.66; for the daily cost per mile, whole weight, $3.28; for the daily cost per pound per mile about $\frac{1}{1000}$ of a cent, and the daily cost per pound for the whole distance would be $0.1165."

I call attention to the conclusion. He says:

> In other words, if we include in that computation the post-office cars, the daily cost per pound is nearly 14 cents for the whole distance. Exclusive of the post-office cars it is nearly 12 cents a pound.

Then he proceeds to compare that with the express charges, in order to show that the railroads are carrying the mail for less than what the express companies will carry it. Here is the fallacy and folly and falsehood of his whole argument plainly and clearly exposed.

> I have here the latest tariff rate of the Adams Express Company from Washington, D. C. I open it at Alabama. I find the rates from Washington to Abbeville $3.25 per 100 pounds, and to Abbeville Junction, $3.75; to Arlington, $4; to Bear Creek, $4.50; to Deer Park, $4; to Delmar, $4.50; to Guntersville, $4—all per 100 pounds.
> Turning to Arizona, I find the rate to Alhambra from Washington, D. C., to be $15.75 per 100 pounds for merchandise by express. Here is another point—Canyon Diablo, $12.50 per 100 pounds; Yuma, $14.25 per 100 pounds, and so on.
> Turning to Arkansas, I find various rates to various points—$4.75 per 100 pounds to one point, $5.50 per 100 pounds to another point, $3 per 100 pounds to another point, making, say, about an average of $4 per 100 pounds for Arkansas.

I will now read what he says as to the rate between San Francisco and New York, for that is where he has figured out what we pay for carrying the mails. He says:

> Our rate from New York to San Francisco—and I think it is about the same from Washington to San Francisco—is $11.65 per 100 pounds.
> Senator ALLISON. As against their $14 or $15?
> Mr. SHALLENBERGER. As against their $15; or, to other points on that coast, still higher sums.

In other words, he shows that we pay for carrying the mail, exclusive of the mail car, nearly 12 cents a pound, while the express company charges 15 cents to San Francisco. Is this an honest basis of comparison? Let us see. We are comparing what the express company pays for service and what the United States pays for service. It has been agreed on all hands that the express company—and Mr. Weir states it in his testimony—pays 40 per cent of its receipts. If the express companies charge $15 a hundred for carrying express matter from New York to San Francisco, the railroad companies would get 40 per cent of $15, or just $6, out of it; and yet Mr. Shallenberger, without making any explanation whatever, and knowing these facts, stated to the committee that we pay 12 cents and the express company charges 15 cents.

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I desire to say that the Senator from South Dakota was present in the committee when the statement was made.

Mr. PETTIGREW. But I did not myself notice the discrepancy until I began to examine the testimony, when I read it, and I believe every other member of the committee was deceived the same as I was. I know the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] was so deceived, for I have since talked with him about it.

It seemed to me that that was a just basis of comparison at the time.

It is rather difficult for a person not experienced in things of this kind to go through a lot of testimony of this sort and get at the facts, where the absolute purpose is to deceive and mislead; and if the testimony was not so full of misleading statements, I would not make these comments in regard to it. I know my strictures are rather severe upon the Department, but they are borne out by the testimony of the officers of the Department themselves. Now let us see. He goes on with further comparisons. He says:

Now, take the route from New York to Ogden. The express quotations to Ogden are $10.25 per 100 pounds; to Frisco, Utah, they would be $12.75.
The mail compensation from New York to Ogden is $8.61 per 100 pounds, the distance being 2,196 miles.

And the railroad company receive from the express company, from New York to Ogden, at 40 per cent of its receipts, $4.08 a hundred pounds, and the Government pays $8.61 per 100 pounds, according to the figures of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General himself; yet he would have us believe that the railroad company gets $10.25 for carrying express matter and $8.61 for carrying the mail. But here is more interesting stuff:

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. From New York to Omaha, Nebr., the mail compensation is $4.37 per 100 pounds. The express charge is $4.25 per 100 pounds.

Therefore the express company pays the railroad company for an exactly parallel service 40 per cent of $4.25, which is $1.70; and we pay for carrying the mail $4.31 per hundred pounds.

But, Mr. President, a more interesting case is the following:

From New York to Chicago I find the mail compensation rate $3.51 per 100 pounds. The actual compensation paid, as shown in the table that I have previously presented, is $3.51 per 100 pounds for 965 miles.
Senator CULLOM. Is that mail matter or express matter?

According to his figures, we pay $3.51 per 100 pounds, and the express company pays 40 per cent of $2.25 per 100 pounds, which is 90 cents. We pay $3.51, and the express company pays 90 cents for the same service. But what is worse in this statement you will find by turning to page 137. I will show how worthless this whole testimony is. On that page you will find a statement of Mr. White, the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, in which he says that we pay for carrying the mail over the New York Central road from New York to Chicago $2,873,518 per year, and the weight is 66,500,000 pounds, or $4.33 per 100 pounds, while the Second Assistant Postmaster-General says, comparing it with the express rates, we pay $3.51 per 100 pounds.

Of course $3.51 to a man who is working for a railroad company, and wants to make out a case for it, makes a better comparison with $2.25 than $4.33 makes. I do not know that this is done purposely, but I presume it is figured out by subordinates. I believe Mr. Shallenberger, so far as he is concerned, is an honest man; but I do believe that he has been deceived in this statement; I know it, for the railroad companies have furnished the material to the subordinates, who were trained under the two previous Second Assistant Postmasters-General, who were railroad employees, and consequently we can not get at the truth from that Department until it is wiped out, the service changed, and every one of those fellows turned out and a new crop put in.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. This is a very important subject, and I think there ought to be more Senators present to listen. I therefore ask that there be a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Foraker,	McMillan,	Roach,
Bacon,	Frye,	Mallory,	Sewell,
Bate,	Gallinger,	Mantle,	Spooner,

Fairbanks,	McEnery,	Quay,
Faulkner,	McLaurin,	Rawlins,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll call shows 57 Senators to be present. There is a quorum of the Senate. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I sent to the Interstate Commerce Commission and asked them to furnish me the data with regard to the decline in passenger and freight rates since 1878; for in 1878 we made the last reduction in the compensation for carrying the mails. There has been no reduction since that time. Twenty years have rolled away and everything else has declined but the pay of the Government to the railroad companies for carrying the mails.

I find that the charge for carrying freight has been reduced by the railroad companies 33 per cent since 1882; and from 1878 to 1882 there has no doubt been a considerable decline. The Interstate Commerce Commission did not have the figures. I have here the figures showing that the railroads have voluntarily decreased the price for carrying freight 33 per cent, and my amendment provides for decreasing the price of carrying the mail but 20 per cent, although the rate for carrying the mails has always been over 100 per cent too high.

I find from 1882 to 1894 the cost was reduced for carrying passengers by the railroads voluntarily over 20 per cent, and that from 1894 to 1896, according to this statement, the charge for carrying passengers has increased a little. I ask leave to insert this letter, with the statement of the facts, in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

The paper referred to is as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Office of the Secretary, Washington, April 6, 1898.

DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of your favor of the 3d instant requesting a statement of the average decline in freight and passenger rates in this country since 1878. I regret that I am unable to find any publication giving any information upon the subject prior to 1882. The accompanying statement, prepared by the auditor of the commission, is taken from Poor's Manual for the years 1882 to 1887, and compiled from the commission's reports since that time. It is believed that the information you desire is best shown by the average rate per ton per mile on freight and the average rate per passenger per mile, which appears in the statement.

Sincerely, yours,
EDW. A. MOSELEY,
Secretary.

Hon. R. F. PETTIGREW,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Auditor's Office, April 5, 1898.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It seems to me, taking all the facts into consideration, that we are abundantly justified in reducing the compensation for carrying the mails 20 per cent. Go to the farmer of this country, and you will find that his products have decreased nearly one-half, more than one-half, much more than one-half, since 1878. The cotton raiser's price of cotton has gone down from 16 and 18 cents a pound to 5 cents per pound. So it is with the wheat raiser; so it is with the producer of almost everything that is produced by human toil; and inasmuch as these producers are the people who pay the taxes, it seems to me we are justified in reducing the mail pay 20 per cent, and then go on with our investigation, which, in my opinion, will show that next year we should reduce it 30 per cent more.

As I said before, the express companies in this country—and I am going over that again, because I want to thoroughly fix that in the minds of Senators—the express companies in this country in 1890 sent 98,000,000 packages, weighing 3,299,000,000 pounds, and they sent 17,000,000 packages which were not weighed. They paid the railroads for carrying all those packages $19,327,000, or 5⅞ mills per pound, while last year the Government paid for the carrying of 528,000,000 pounds of mail nearly $30,000,000, or 5¼ cents a pound, or ten times as much as the express companies paid for carrying their property. It seems to me that all these facts justify the proposed reduction.

I am going to review very briefly the testimony submitted by the railroad companies in this connection, because it seems to me to be a case made up by the railroad companies upon which those who favor the present high rate of compensation rely.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to say, Mr. President, to the Senator from South Dakota, that it is not upon the case made out by the railroad companies alone, but upon the case made out by the Post-Office Department, and upon the case made out by the express companies, on which the Committee on Appropriations rely.

Mr. PETTIGREW. They are all in partnership.

Mr. QUAY. That is only a supposition upon which the Senator bases his statement.

Mr. PETTIGREW. All I ask of any person is that they will read the majority report of the committee as a corroboration of my statement.

Mr. Baldwin, representing the Chicaco, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, makes this statement, on page 10 of the printed evidence:

Upon these heavy routes also the question of weight is controlling, and in them only will be found a fair basis for determining the rate per pound that is being paid, and for comparing the rates with those paid by other customers of the railroad company, and for deciding whether the Government is getting the benefit of fair reductions in price, having in view the constantly increasing service it demands, and which requires a constantly greater expense. The routes carrying in excess of 5,000 pounds per day receive $22,641,000 out of a total expenditure of $33,876,000, or over two-thirds of the whole mail compensation, and they carry nine-tenths of the total weight.

I am going to accept that as true for the purpose of this argument. I do not know whether it is true or not, but for the purpose of this argument I will accept it as true. Then he goes on to say:

A small portion of this tonnage, namely, up to 5,000 pounds, on these heavy routes goes at 4 cents a pound for the haul of 448 miles; but the great weight (over 4,000,000 pounds per day) is carried at the legal minimum of 1.3 cents per pound.

Let us see how this works out. He says that these roads receive $22,641,000 out of a total compensation of $33,876,000, and that they carry nine-tenths of the total weight of the mail, which that year was 528,000,000 pounds. Take nine-tenths of 528,000,000, which is 475,300,000, and divide the $22,641,000, which he says they receive, and you will find that they receive 4¼ cents per pound for every pound they carry; and yet he tells us in the next paragraph (and this is the sort of rubbish they present to the Committee on Appropriations) that—

A small portion of this tonnage, namely, up to 5,000 pounds, on these heavy routes goes at 4 cents a pound for the haul of 448 miles; but the great weight (over 4,000,000 pounds per day) is carried at the legal minimum of 1.3 cents per pound.

But the Department says the average distance mail is carried is 828 miles.

Then he says—

It is a matter of mathematical demonstration.

I should think it was; and so on, all the way through all these statements of these railroad attorneys we have this same misleading, confusing, and deceptive testimony. I do not say that these men committed perjury, for we did not swear any of them. They made statements.

You recollect, Mr. President, that in the examination of the trans-Mississippi freight rates, the railroad managers all came in and swore that there was not a pool, and finally Mr. Stickney, who was manager and president of the Great Western Railroad, came in and swore that there was a pool, and that he was in it. In other words, they protect the service they are engaged to protect, and to protect the railway service of this country requires a peculiar conscience.

On page 65 is the statement made by the Louisville and Nashville road. I noticed this statement when it was being read by the Secretary and I made a memorandum of it:

I think it is proper to suggest that the railroads have the right to expect the Government to pay them at least as much for the use of their passenger trains, in proportion to the labor performed and the services rendered, as the public using the same trains pay. But the company's statistics show that the Louisville and Nashville Company secured for the year ended June 30, 1897, net earnings per car mile for the transportation of passengers, after the payment of operating expenses—not including interest and taxes—6.23 cents, while from the mail they only secured 4.96 cents, a difference of over 25 per cent in favor of the passenger account.

You will find on page 124 Mr. White's statement that the average pay per mile for every single one of the postal cars used by this country is 6.84 cents per mile, as against 4.96 cents according to this statement.

Then on page 66 we have the price they charge for freight 10 miles. That includes not only the transportation, but the cost of getting the freight, the depot charges, terminal charges, which make up the bulk of the cost of doing the freight business; and in this connection I will put into the RECORD the statement of various roads as to the cost of handling freight cars and freight trains after the trains are loaded.

The Government loads the mail on a train. Then it is carried by the railroad company, and yet the railroad attorney who makes this statement compares the total freight rate with the amount that the Government pays simply for hauling the freight over the road, and then he takes the smallest possible distance they have—10 miles—and therefore the highest rate. He says for 10 miles or less the charge is 12 cents per 100 pounds, while the Government pays only 5.6 cents per 100 pounds, leaving out entirely the cost of securing the business, which is the chief item in a short haul of 10 miles for freight.

COST OF HAULING FREIGHT CARS ON THE UNION PACIFIC ROAD.

In 1890 the cost of hauling a loaded car (on the Union Pacific Railroad) 1 mile, that is, including all the expense of the locomotive and car departments, was 3.17 cents a mile; in 1891 it cost us 3.05 cents; in 1894, 2.65 cents, and in the month of October, 1895, it cost us 2.01 cents to haul a loaded car 1 mile.—Statement of J. H. McConnell, superintendent locomotive power, the Union Pacific Railroad. See Railroad Review, February 29, 1896.

COST OF HAULING FREIGHT CARS ON THE SOO LINE.

On May 1, 1895, the Soo Line commenced rating its locomotives on a tonnage basis. The cost per mile of hauling freight cars in 1894 was 1.13 cents, and in 1895 it was 1 cent.—Railroad Review, March 28, 1896.

In his paper on "Locomotive service," published in the Railroad Review of January 18, 1896, Mr. McConnell stated that on the Union Pacific 28 loaded cars are now hauled by the same engine that used to haul 22 cars, and in one case the increase had been from 23 to 35 cars. He also said that the additional cost to a train by attaching thereto an additional loaded car would only be the value of 5 pounds of coal per car mile, and in a yearly course of 36,000 miles the increased cost would only be the value of 90 tons of coal.

As to the wastefulness of our private railway managers in the use of their freight equipment, the following is of importance.

In a paper read at the December, 1896, meeting of the St. Louis Railway Club, J. R. Cavagnah, superintendent car service of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis road, said:

"There are about 1,750,000 freight cars owned by railroads in North America, representing an investment of about $500,000,000. From the best information obtainable these cars average a little over 6 tons per mile, or about 10 tons per loaded car mile. Freight equipment is idle an average of 75 per cent, or in service about 25 per cent of the time. What causes this large percentage of idleness? Delays incidental to loading and unloading, switching, terminals, etc., consume a portion of it; but as much time is lost waiting for loads, giving loads preference over empties, holding for home routes, for transfers, etc.

Car Accountant Wheatly, of the West Shore road, says that of the freight-car equipment of the United States in 1892, 248,000 cars were absolutely idle, and these cars representing a capital of $124,000,000, occasioned not only a loss of the interest on their cost but an additional loss of $10,000,000 annually for their maintenance, to say nothing of the cost of track room to hold them, locomotives to move them, and the other minor yet necessary expenses which their existence involves; and still, he says, the private managers of the railroads pay over $30,000,000 a year for the use of private cars and Mr. Wheatly's figures as to the cost of private cars are supported by the testimony of Mr. Aldace F. Walker.—Railroad Review, September 3, 1892.

I may also add that S. P. Bush, superintendent of locomotive power of the Pennsylvania lines west of Pittsburg, makes the cost of hauling loaded and empty cars the same. In the Engineering News of June 3, Mr. Bush states that on a run of 115 miles from Chicago to Logansport, Ind., an increase in the load of a freight train of 32 cars from 750 to 1,050 tons occasioned the use (the additional cost) of but 400 pounds of coal. There was no other increase of expenses. In other words, the cost to the road for the haul of the additional 300 tons of freight for a distance of 115 miles was but the cost of 400 pounds of coal, certainly less than 50 cents.

For further information on these points note pages 145 and 146 of my book, A General Freight and Passenger Post.

As to passenger trains, the railroad reports of the year 1897 show that the trains run with only about one-sixth of their seats occupied.

JAMES L. COWLES.

I find that Mr. Dudley, in making his statement for the railroads for which he is attorney, says:

The report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1897 gives the cost of the railroads of the United States at $12,179,865,771.

That is the amount they are bonded and stocked for, and nobody pretends that that is what they cost, and Mr. Dudley knows they did not cost that sum. But he lays that down as a premise from which to make an argument and draw conclusions to convince us that the railroads receive too little compensation for carrying the mails.

So with these half falsehoods, these misleading statements all through this evidence, on almost every page of it, they undertake to make up a case to justify charging ten times as much per pound for carrying the mail as they charge for carrying express matter.

I beg pardon of the Senate for presenting this subject in so disconnected a way; but the investigation was a hurried one, and we have had but little opportunity since the investigation to look into the matter and digest this mass of testimony. I wish I had more time and could have presented it in a better manner.

Mr. QUAY. I send to the desk a communication from the Postmaster-General to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 6, 1898.

SIR: In the hope that the bill which I submit herewith may meet the approval of your committee, and that the committee may be disposed to offer it as an amendment to the pending Post-Office appropriation bill, I venture to call it to your attention, with the view of securing speedy action thereon. The bill explains itself.

It is intended to clothe the Postmaster-General with ample facilities to provide postal accommodations for the Army pending the existing war with Spain at any fort, camp, or rendezvous where they may be assembled. Possibly, by a somewhat unreasonable construction of existing laws, to state it otherwise, upon the doctrine of military necessity, the application of existing laws might be sufficient to enable the establishment of such postal service. But there would likely arise some embarrassment to the accounting officers as well as to the Post-Office Department if the defects of existing statutes which this bill is intended to cure were not provided for in advance of the establishment of such service. For instance, the law relating to the creation of branch post-offices within the radius of free-delivery offices prohibits the establishment of a branch post-office at any point more than 5 miles distant from the corporate limits of the town or city in which the main office is located.

If that prohibition is not cured, it may, and probably will, lead to serious embarrassment in connection with the objects sought. Such a result has already been demonstrated in the case of the massing of troops at Chickamauga Park. That park is 10 or more miles from Chattanooga, a free-delivery city, and under the law as it exists a branch post-office could not be established there. The nearest office was but a short distance from the park—a little fourth-class office at which, under the law, no allowance could be made to the postmaster for increased clerical help. But for the 5-mile-limit law I would have promptly established a branch office at Chickamauga Park and authorized the postmaster at Chattanooga to provide it with all the clerks necessary to conduct the business.

Under the law relating to the postal service it is competent for the Postmaster-General to establish a post-office at any point and to appoint a postmaster, who at once enters upon his duty as the head of a fourth-class office. But he would become a postmaster of the fourth class, whose compensation would be fixed upon the basis of commissions to be determined upon his returns for four consecutive quarters, and he could not, therefore, pass into a higher grade nor receive any allowance whatever to conduct his office. The establishment of such an office at any military camp would fail of its object.

The bill submitted herewith is intended to cure the two defects referred to—the one relating to the embarrassing five-mile-limit clause, the other forbidding the Postmaster-General to make extraordinary allowances within his discretion to meet the necessities of such an office. As the bill does not apply to any portion of the postal service except that relating to the necessities of the Army, I apprehend that no reasonable objection will be found to its enactment.

A duplicate of this communication will be addressed to the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the Post-Office appropriation bill, and also to the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate.

Very respectfully,

CH. EMORY SMITH,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman of Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

Mr. QUAY. It has occurred to the Committee on Appropriations, it being important to the interests of the Government that this bill should pass at once, that it would become a law much sooner by passing it as a separate measure than by sending it to a committee of conference on the Post-Office appropriation bill. I understand that the acting chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is ready to report the bill and to ask its passage. I think there is not likely to be any objection to it on the part of the Senate. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the pending bill be informally laid aside for the present, to enable the Senator from New Hampshire to present the bill, and that the appropriation bill be taken up as soon as the discussion on the bill to be offered by the Senator from New Hampshire shall have been concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Post-Office appropriation bill be informally laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

POST-OFFICES AT MILITARY CAMPS.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the bill which has been transmitted by the Postmaster-General has been examined by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, and has also been examined by one or two members of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is now absent from the Chamber, serving upon the Committee on Finance. In his absence I offer the bill and ask that it may be read, and that we shall then proceed to its consideration.

The bill (S. 4554) to authorize the establishment of post-offices at military posts or camps was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the continuance of hostilities between the United States and Spain the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, establish a temporary post-office at any military post or camp, for the purpose of supplying the officers and troops there encamped with mails, the location of which post-office may at any time be changed to any other post or camp. On the establishment of such post-office he shall cooperate with the Secretary of War or officer commanding such post or camp, for the purpose of securing the detail of an officer of the Regular or Volunteer Army of suitable rank to act as postmaster, who shall, when the exigency will permit, execute a bond to the United States as such, and of a sufficient number of noncommissioned officers and privates to act as clerks in said post-office, who shall serve as such without additional salary, pay, or compensation other than that attaching to their rank and position in the Army. Each of said persons shall, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, take the oath prescribed for persons employed in the postal service. In any case where it is deemed impracticable by the military authorities to detail persons from the Army to act as postmaster or clerks, the Postmaster-General is authorized to appoint a civilian as postmaster, and also to make a special order allowing to him reasonable compensation for clerical services and to meet the necessary expenses of said office, as well as a proportionate increase of salary to the postmaster during the period of such extraordinary business as may attach to his office, under the provisions of section 3682, Revised Statutes, payable out of the appropriations for the postal service. He may also provide for the issue and payment of money orders at any post-office established under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. The Postmaster-General shall supply to post-offices referred to in the preceding section all necessary postage stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards, and other supplies of whatever description. He may also prescribe regulations for the conduct of the business at such post-offices in conformity, so far as the same may be applicable, to the regulations relating to the ordinary postal service.

SEC. 3. In any case where, in the judgment of the Postmaster-General, any military post or camp can be better and more economically supplied by a branch post office, he may, without reference to its distance from the main office, establish the same and meet the expenses thereof by special order, as in the case of post-offices referred to in the preceding section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. PASCO. I rise to express the request that the bill may go over until Monday and be printed. I do not understand that it has been considered by a committee of this body. Surely the delay of a day or two in an important matter like this can not make any difference. I hope the bill may be printed and referred to a committee, and when we meet again it can come back with the approval or disapproval of the committee. It will cause but a single day's delay to accomplish that result. For one I should like to see it in print before acting upon it.

Mr. QUAY. The bill has been considered by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, and also at least by some members of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It provides merely for the establishment of post-offices at camps. Those camps are now organizing and some have been actually formed. There ought to be a post-office at Chickamauga now, where many troops are concentrated, but owing to the defect in the present law the Postmaster-General can not establish one there. I will send a copy of the bill to the Senator from Florida, and I think on examination he will have no objection to it.

Mr. PASCO. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that it will not expedite matters at all to act upon the bill to-day, as the House is not in session. The bill can be passed here Monday morning and go to the House as speedily as if passed to-day. There will be no time saved by considering it now. It seems to me there is no necessity for this hasty legislation. If the bill comes up at our next session, to-morrow morning or even Monday morning, it will reach the House as soon as if passed to-day.

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator from Florida objects to the consideration of the bill at this time, of course it must go over until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

Mr. CHANDLER. Under the circumstances, recognizing that the Senator from Florida has a perfect right to ask for further time, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9008) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PETTIGREW.

Mr. FAULKNER addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from West Virginia will pardon me, I desire to speak on this question when the Senator is through, but I am compelled to absent myself from the Chamber now, and I shall not be able to return this afternoon. Therefore I ask that we may have an understanding that the bill be passed over until Monday; that no final vote be taken on it until Monday. I suppose there will be no objection to such an arrangement. I have several amendments that I desire to offer.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. QUAY. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9008) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PETTIGREW.

Mr. QUAY. With the permission of the Senator from West Virginia, in reply to the request of the Senator from North Carolina, I have no objection to the bill going over until Monday, and will consult his convenience if it is understood that we shall take the final vote on Monday. I hope I can have unanimous consent to that effect, that before we adjourn on Monday the final vote on the passage of the bill shall be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania make that request?

Mr. QUAY. I make that request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the final vote on this bill and all amendments to it shall be taken before adjournment on Monday.

Mr. GORMAN and others. Agreed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I would not engage at all in the discussion of the matter before the Senate if it were not that I am a member of the Subcommittee on Appropriations which considered this bill and a member of the full committee which finally acted upon it. The subject was one entirely novel to me. I had never had an opportunity to examine the matters submitted to the subcommittee prior to the investigation made under the bill now before the Senate for its consideration. My views upon this subject, formed upon information which was not official, was to a great extent in accord with the views expressed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], and I but express my surprise at the evidence which was laid before the committee, and which to a great extent have changed the opinions which I have heretofore entertained.

The question submitted to the Senate is simply this: The House having made the ordinary and usual appropriation for the inland railway transportation of the mails in the Post-Office appropriation bill, when it reached the Senate it was referred to the Appropriations Committee. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] introduced an amendment, which was approved by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, providing for a full, complete, and exhaustive examination of the question whether the Government of the United States was paying too large a sum to the railroads for the transportation of the mails—first, as to the transportation of mails by weight, and secondly, in paying too much for what is known as the railway postal car service. After full consideration of the subject, including the amendments submitted by other Senators providing for a reduction in the amount of railway compensation, we deemed it just and proper to that committee whose duty it was to advise the Senate that at least a partial investigation should be had by the subcommittee touching this question.

With that object in view, we notified the railroads of the country that we would hear anything they had to say upon the subject. We thought it better to hear them first and our own officials afterwards, that any misstatements that they might make or erroneous views which they might express to the committee could be corrected by the officials of the Post-Office Department, who are familiar with these questions, and would be able to answer as well as clear up any doubt which they should create in the minds of the committee as to the propriety of reducing the compensation at present paid.

We first heard the railroads. We then called the post-office officials having charge of this particular subject. We requested the attendance, at the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota, of the president of the Adams Express Company. We then urged him at that time to suggest any other gentlemen who had any knowledge or could give any information on the subject, and informed him that we would call whomsoever he desired before the subcommittee, that all the light bearing upon this question accessible to anyone in the United States should be obtained. He could give us no suggestion as to anyone we could call other than those we did call. The subject was before the subcommittee ten days or two weeks, during which time a suggestion as to any other witnesses he desired to have brought before the committee would have resulted in having them notified.

Finding that there was no other information then obtainable, the question of the consideration of these amendments came before the committee. Although the evidence was apparently conclusive, so far as introduced before the committee, as to the fairness of the present charge for mail transportation, the minds of the committee were not so thoroughly satisfied that they deemed it proper to reject the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. We felt that this question was one of great public interest, that it was one involving the expenditure of $34,000,000 of the people's money, and that, as many had grave doubts as to whether the compensation was fair and just, there should be a deliberate and exhaustive investigation of the whole subject.

We therefore incorporated the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire into the bill. We felt that in this investigation members of the Post-Office Committee of both the Senate and the House should participate and be members of the investigating commission, as they had peculiarly in their charge the entire subject of post-office administration and the duty of recommending to the Appropriations Committee subjects affecting postal affairs. Consequently the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire provides that the chairmen of the Committee of Post-Office and Post-Roads of the Senate and the Post-Office Committee of the House shall be members of this joint commission to be appointed by the two Houses, whose duty it will be during the coming summer and fall to fully investigate the subject and make its recommendations to the next session of Congress.

The evidence before the committee was uncontradicted and undisputed, and I say without any reservation that the statements submitted by the railroad officials and the Post-Office Department are undisputed and uncontradicted by any evidence. There was nothing before the Appropriations Committee on which it could base its action but that evidence, and under it we could do but one of two things—approve the appropriation made by the House, or, after doing that, amend the bill by providing for a commission to more fully investigate the whole subject, that its conclusions may be laid before Congress at its next session.

Mr. President, the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota would destroy, I believe, many of the mail routes on roads in my State. It would seriously affect many of the mail routes on roads in the West and in the Southern States. It makes no discrimination between routes as to whether a route is getting too much or too little. It simply declares an arbitrary reduction upon all routes of 20 per cent of the present rate of transportation. Sir, the charge of transportation on the larger roads is the lowest known to the world. It is only when you examine the rate as to small roads which carry from one to two hundred pounds of mail a day that the cost of transportation is apparently high.

Why is it high in those cases? Because the carrying of the mail is not by weight. Congress recognized in 1873, when it passed the law by which this question should be governed, that if facilities were to be given to the people on the smaller lines where the mail was less than 200 pounds, it could not be fixed by weight, but must be an arbitrary compensation paid per mile. That compensation, for the services rendered, is, in my judgment, the very lowest, yet considered by the pounds carried it is the highest paid, and should you take 20 per cent off the roads would not carry the mail, or if they did it would be done as an act of charity to the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota tells us that we are paying $15,000,000 more for this service than we ought to pay. See how unreasonable that proposition is. If we are paying to these railroads for carrying the mail $15,000,000 more than we ought to pay, then the cost of our transportation of mail over 178,000 miles of railroads, to supply the wants, the demands, the necessities of 70,000,000 people, would cost about what the carrier service in the cities of this country costs. It shows upon its face that the proposition is unsound, that it is absolutely baseless so far as having any facts or justification to rest upon.

Mr. President, we can not compare our postal service with that of England or France or Germany. There is but one country with which you can compare the cost of mail service in this country, and that is the Empire of Russia. The longest route in England is 450 miles, and in the United States 3,584 miles; and that does not include Alaska. In the first mail which we sent to Circle City, Alaska, each letter cost the Government of the United States $450.

Mr. GEAR. And it got 2 cents postage.

Mr. FAULKNER. It got 2 cents for carrying it. The cost to the Government of the United States of carrying the letter was $450. You can not consider these questions in the narrow way in which the Senator from South Dakota has attempted to present it to the Senate. In the thickly settled sections of the East, where business is active and population large, where everyone is alive to the advantages of the facilities provided by the mails, and whose interest stimulates an extensive use of it, the cost of the service is small; but in sections of the West and South, where the country is thinly settled, the rate per pound is greater as the volume of mail decreases, for the same rate of postage is paid in both. Take the interior portion of my State, which has a road carrying 73 pounds of mail a day, and for which it receives $42.75 a mile for carrying it a year. Of course you should not compare the cost on such a road with the service on the great trunk lines, with their vast volume of mail, and yet when you average the rate for the whole country it materially increases the per cent of cost per pound.

Mr. President, I never examined this question before the present session, never having had occasion to do so, but I have no hesitation in saying that the author of the bill under which the compensation for the railway postal service in the United States is made was not only a most excellent and eminent lawyer, but a wise and farseeing statesman. He recognized, sir, what would be the future development of this great country of ours. He fully realized what a wonderful growth of business would develop year after year, and he determined to frame such a statute that, without the interposition of Congress, by reason of its automatic working, as that business, that volume of mail increased, the Government under its provisions should have the benefit of a decreasing cost of transportation. Sir, his wisdom has been vindicated to such an extent that when I present the facts you must admit that it has worked marvelously.

These facts will not be opinions, they will not be simply conjectures on the part of officials, they will not be the manipulation of figures by those under the influence of railroads, but they will be the actual tonnage on particular roads, the actual sum paid annually to those roads, the extent of the service rendered, and a contrast as to the cost of transportation fifteen years ago and at the present time, showing the decrease in the cost of transportation on those roads carrying a large per cent of the mail, and these figures will be fully sustained by the records of the Post-Office Department.

There are two charges for mail transportation. One is by weight and the other is for the use of postal railway cars. I wish to call the attention of the Senate, because I think it has a right to the same information that influenced the judgment of the committee, to the law under which the compensation to the railroads is paid by the Government of the United States. You will then appreciate the wisdom of the law which provided the method by which the amount of the payments was to be determined. The law provides that where there is a daily average of 200 pounds the cost shall be $1.17 per ton per mile per day, or 5.85 cents per 100 pounds. The operation of the law is shown by the following table:

Daily average weight.	Cost per ton per mile per day.	Cost per 100 pounds.
Pounds.		Cents.
2,000	.35	1.75
20,000	.09	(*)
50,000	.07	.35
200,000	.061	.3

* Less than one-half cent.

Mr. President, when you reach 5,000 pounds of mail per day, the law provides that every 2,000 pounds in excess shall be carried at the lowest rate, $25 per mile—one-half of what is allowed for carrying 2,000 pounds. Consequently 20,000 pounds would be carried for 9 cents instead of 18 at 5,000 pounds per ton per mile, or one-half cent per 100 pounds; 50,000 at 7 cents per ton per mile, or thirty-five one-hundredths of a cent per 100 pounds; 100,000 at 6.4 cents per ton per mile, or thirty-two one-hundredths of a cent per 100 pounds. At 200,000 pounds it would be 6.1 cents per ton per mile, or three-tenths of a cent per 100 pounds per mile; and at 300,000 pounds it would be 6 cents per ton per mile, or three-tenths of a cent per 100 pounds. We have routes in this country that carry over 300,000 pounds per day, and when you reach 5,000 pounds per day, or above 5,000, the rates of transportation are lower than they are in any other country with similar demands upon the service.

The Senator from South Dakota seems to think that the express company can compete within a radius of 500 miles with the mail transportation. He is mistaken in that idea. On gross bulky articles, like circulars or anything that they can pack into an ordinary express car and which is carried as express goods, often on fast freights and sometimes on a passenger train, they can within a radius of 250 or 300 miles compete as against our second-class matter. The Senate is now in possession of the law which controls the rate of transportation of the mail when paid for by weight.

Now, we have another provision of law which affects this rate of transportation of mails. I want to get all these facts before those Senators who are kind enough to give me their attention, as they are at the basis of the whole question whether the rate paid is too high. The pay for postal cars of the length of a 40-foot car is 3.4 cents per mile run; for a 45-foot car it is 4 cents per mile run; for a 50-foot car it is 5.4 cents per mile run; for a 60-foot car it is 7 cents per mile run. The average is 4.9 cents per car per mile run. That is, the average payment by the Government of the United States for the postal-car service is 4.9 cents per car per mile run; you may say within a fraction of 5 cents a mile. That is the cost to the Government for the privilege they demand of carrying the mails in a particular kind of a car, constructed by the railroad under specifications of the Department.

It is said that the cost is too high. The evidence was undisputed before the subcommittee that you could not transport a similar car even on a freight train for an individual or a corporation in the United States without paying to the railroad 10 cents for each running mile, double the cost paid by the Government, although the mail car is carried on fast express trains.

But, says my friend from South Dakota, these cars are no better and cost no more than the common express cars. That is an entire misapprehension. The evidence before the committee is that they cost $6,000. They are fitted up in the very best style.

The Post-Office Department prescribes the method and mode of their construction and every class of furniture and arrangement that shall be put inside of the cars. The railroad company has no discretion whatever as to the specifications on which they are constructed. It is controlled entirely by the Department. They have all the facilities as to the distribution of the mail; and they have, in addition to that, all the cupboards necessary for containing the clothes of the officers and postal clerks who are sent with them. The Post-Office Department requires that the company shall furnish the car with the very best light that can be procured, for the reason that the best light is essential in the services performed by the postal clerks in the distribution of the mail. It costs, in fact, as shown by the testimony before us (and I know nothing on the subject except from the testimony), $6,000 to construct one of these cars.

The Senator suggested that the Government should do away with these cars and buy its own cars. A 60-foot car has to make a round trip to earn $50 per mile. It is really but $25 a running mile. In other words, for the largest car used is paid $50, which is 7 cents per running mile.

As I was saying, the question has been submitted, Why does not the Government build these cars? There is no one who owns cars and has them transported on any of the railroad trains except connecting roads. So we were informed by the witnesses before us. They are all owned by the railroads. But why does not the Government do this? Simply because, if the evidence before the committee is true, it would cost the Government too much to maintain them and to pay the mileage that would be demanded for their transportation, which for all patrons but the Government is 10 cents a mile.

The estimate of the Post-Office Department is that a car runs 91,250 miles a year. At 10 cents a mile, with the cost of lighting, the cost of repair, the cost of fuel, it would cost the Government annually for each car $10,881. The Government pays for that car $6,250 a year. The running expenses would be far in excess of the value of the car. Some say that is very remarkable. Why should we pay $10,881, the annual cost per car, for its transportation, for keeping it supplied with fuel and lighting and keeping it in repair? That is more than the cost of the car itself. Of course it is. But how often, gentlemen, have we known wagons that cost perhaps $50 and yet when they were used for transporting goods and other products the cost of same exceeded cost of purchase. The original cost is investment; the running and maintenance is the expense. The depreciation on investment, the cost of the horses, of the men employed, and the feed consumed during their use is the basis on which to calculate profits on your haul. All those things enter into the calculation just as it does into this question of the cost of postal cars.

To properly consider this subject all the facts should be before the Senate. We have 2,587 postal railroad routes in this country. There are only 255 of those routes on which postal cars run. The mail is carried on the other roads under different arrangements. On such routes the mail is carried in the baggage car of the railroad company without any cost of mileage to the Government for car space. In other words, when a route does not carry a mail of over 5,000 pounds per day it can be carried in a section of the baggage car. There are 2,700 of those cars used by the Post-Office Department, fitted up for the postal service by the railroad companies without any compensation whatever by the Government except the compensation they get for the weight of the mail carried.

Of the 2,700 cars in which there are postal apartments, 900 are less than 16 feet in length. The remainder, over 1,700, run from 16 feet to 30 feet in length, fitted with proper conveniences for the distribution of the mail, and for which no mileage is paid.

There is another thing that we must take into consideration. There is no contract between the railroad company and the Government of the United States for carrying the mail. The law fixes the compensation; the Postmaster-General fixes the obligation through departmental regulations, and whatever obligation he imposes upon these companies becomes the law that governs them. We are told by the officials of the Department that they have met these requirements and cooperated with the Department in improving the service.

Mr. President, it is difficult to make any comparison between the service in carrying the mail and any other transportation. It is the right of the Post-Office Department to say you shall carry the mail upon any train that leaves the city of Washington or the city of New York or any other city. The company may, in order to increase business, to meet competition, put on a very fast train from New York to Washington, and the Post-Office Department has a right to step in and say that fast trains shall carry the mail between those two points. This power is exercised by no other customer of the road.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Does the fast passenger train between Washington and New York carry the mail?

Mr. FAULKNER. I suppose so.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Does the Congressional Limited carry the mail?

Mr. FAULKNER. I suppose so.

Mr. TELLER. Not at all.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not know whether it does or not, but I assert that if it is the wish of the Postmaster-General that the company shall carry it on that train, it is bound to carry it under the law as cited by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Does the Pennsylvania Limited to Chicago carry the mail?

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not know whether it does or not. I am asserting the proposition of law that it is in the power of the Post-Office Department to compel the Chicago Limited to carry it if the Department desires the road to do so.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state that the average speed of the express trains in the United States is 26 miles an hour, and that the swiftest passenger trains do not carry the mail.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not know whether the Chicago Limited carries the mail or not, but I know if it is the wish of the Department that it should do so, it is compelled under the law to do it; and if it were in the interest of the public service, I am satisfied the Department would require the mail to be carried on those trains.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator from West Virginia to state that the Postmaster-General has power to force any railroad company to carry the mail unless it sees fit to do it?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes, sir; and it has exercised it without question on all post-roads. It has never been denied even by the corporations themselves, as is testified to in this evidence.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator say that there is any law by which the Post-Office Department can require the mail to be carried by the railroads should they refuse to carry it?

Mr. FAULKNER. I have not investigated that question, nor is it a material question.

Mr. MASON. They are made post-roads, are they not?

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course they are made post-roads.

Mr. BUTLER. It is material, because the Senator followed that statement by another one, to the effect that this power had never been denied and that it was exercised by the Department; that no railroad ever denied its exercise. That is not correct, I will inform the Senator.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to know if the Postmaster-General did not so state before the committee. If you can show that he was mistaken I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. Postmaster-General Vilas in his report recommended to Congress to pass such an act, calling attention to the fact that the Department was powerless, and at the same time he called attention to the fact that the railroad companies had refused to carry the mail when he had made an attempt to reduce their compensation to what he thought was a fair price. I do not happen to have that report with me, but I will state to the Senator that I expect to speak on this question when he gets through, and I shall take the trouble to get it and present the facts to the Senate. I would not have interrupted the Senator now, but he was making his statement with much positiveness.

Mr. FAULKNER. And the Senator from West Virginia has not altered or changed or modified it by any fact that the Senator from North Carolina has stated. The Senator from North Carolina has gone off on an entirely different proposition. I stated that the Department had exercised the right, and it never had been denied, to put a postal car upon any train leaving any city in the United States. The Senator said that according to the report of Mr. Vilas they had declined, because he wanted to reduce their compensation.

Mr. BUTLER. They never declined when they were being paid two or three times as much for the service as they got for the other service that they were doing for the general public. It would be astonishing if they had declined. It is perfectly natural for them to submit to the dictates of the Department when the Department is dictating that they shall receive two or three hundred per cent profit. There has been but one report of a Postmaster-General showing that the Department attempted to reduce their rates.

[At this point an agreement was reached to take the final vote upon the bill next Monday.]

Mr. FAULKNER. Before the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] leaves the Chamber, permit me to say, in connection with the remarks he has made, that I hope he will produce that report, because I am satisfied that as good a lawyer as the gentleman to whom he refers, when he was the Postmaster-General, never made a proposition to a railroad company to reduce its compensation, because he had no power to do it, and he knew it. The compensation of the railroad companies is fixed by law, and not by the Department.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator from West Virginia mean to state that the original act, which I have not before me, provides a fixed price for carrying the mails?

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course I do.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not the maximum price?

Mr. FAULKNER. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Then will the Senator be kind enough to point it out?

Mr. FAULKNER. There is no maximum price except on a road that carries less than 200 pounds a day; simply the small lateral roads. On all the other roads the price is fixed and definite, depending upon weight in one case and mileage in the other.

Mr. BUTLER. With no discretion in the Postmaster-General?

Mr. FAULKNER. None.

Mr. BUTLER. Then there is all the greater necessity for Congress to take some action.

Mr. FAULKNER. Provided the rate now paid is unjust to the Government, that is correct.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to a law that he disputed. You will find it in the second edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States, page 773:

SEC. 4000. Every railway company carrying the mail shall carry on any train which may run over its road, and without extra charge therefor, all mailable matter directed to be carried thereon, with the person in charge of the same.

It can compel it by law on any post route.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any penalty if they refuse?

Mr. FAULKNER. I have not gone further. I have simply the evidence of the Department that they never have refused.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I was well aware of the statute which the Senator has just read. The statement I made was that they did not carry it out. That simply made it conclusive to me that there was a pretty fair understanding between the companies and the Department, and no wonder that there is, because railroad employees have been the heads of that Department for eight years.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, is it not remarkable that my friend from South Dakota in everything that is done will try to find some corrupt, disgraceful, fraudulent purpose upon the part of the officials of the Government? Now, that is not fair, nor is it just to those gentlemen.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to state——

Mr. FAULKNER. You do not know the circumstances under which these officials determine this particular service, nor do I know.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In that connection I wish to say that the testimony taken a year ago, which I have read, with regard to the men who have been at the head of this division rather bears out the statement I have made in reference to the Department, and the testimony which the officers of the Department gave further corroborates that. It is with great regret that I charge any Department with being derelict in its duty or with making statements which are not borne out by the facts or which are contrary to the interests of the Government. I regret very much that I have been obliged, under the evidence and the facts presented, to make these statements with regard to the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General; but he is guilty.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I do not feel that it is my duty to defend the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, but I may say to the Senate and to the Senator from South Dakota that I have seen few men in my short public experience who have so thoroughly and individually mastered the subjects coming under the control of his Department as that gentleman seems to have done, judging from evidence which he gave before the committee and in the conversations which I subsequently had with him on doubtful questions, which I did not thoroughly understand. In these interviews he did not have to call upon the heads of his different bureaus or his chiefs of division to advise him on any of those subjects, but he seemed to be thoroughly and personally cognizant of all the facts which could elucidate the subjects which were submitted to his consideration.

The Senator from South Dakota further says that the men who furnished this information were placed in the Department by men who had previously, under the two Administrations of Mr. Harrison and Mr. Cleveland, been connected with railroad companies. Why, sir, the man on whom the Second Assistant Postmaster-General must rely, the man on whom this committee must rely, and the man on whom the public has a right to rely has been an official servant of this Government in the discharging of this particular duty for thirty-five years; so expert, so accurate, has he been in all the details of this work that no Administration has deemed it proper to transfer him to any other service or to discharge him from the public service. That, sir, is the highest encomium which can be passed upon any public official of the Government prior to the time at least when the civil-service law (which our friends are now so frequently trying to avoid by indirection) became a law of our country.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In this connection, if the Senator will allow me, section 4002 of the Revised Statutes has this provision:

That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates.

Then it establishes the rates. It further says:

The Postmaster-General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation hereafter to be paid for the transportation of mails on railroad routes upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned.

Then it says that they shall not exceed certain rates. Does not that give the power to fix the rates to the Postmaster-General?

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator must know that the schedule fixed by the statute is so arranged that practically there can not be any maximum and minimum rates, and the power to readjust is simply the power at the end of four years, if on weighing the mail it exceed or falls below the amount on which the rate rested four years anterior to that time to readjust it under the rates fixed in the statute.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The section of the Revised Statutes to which I have referred says:

That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely.

And then it gives the rates. Does not that give the Postmaster-General the power? It seems to me it does, for it says:

That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of 200 pounds, $50; 500 pounds, $75; * * * the average weight to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails.

Mr. FAULKNER. I have shown to the Senate—and the Senator has the law before him which shows it—that the maximum rate is fixed by the amount of matter carried. The weight, which is referred to, is so close that there can be but one rate, and that is the maximum all the way through; and the readjustment only applies to the question of the reweighing at the end of four years. Otherwise, by reducing one of the classes, you would find that you had fallen below the maximum fixed for the daily weight of number of pounds of the class below the one lowered. To change one all would have to be lowered, and that would be unjust to the small roads.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from West Virginia is willing to yield, so that he may finish his remarks when the Senate again meets, I will move to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope not yet, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CULLOM. I will yield long enough to ascertain what the Senator desires.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill and to ask its consideration and, I hope, its passage. It is a bill which is constantly demanded by the War Department to increase the number of assistant surgeons and authorize the employment of contract surgeons. The Surgeon-General says that they are making new camps every day in various parts of the country, and they find great difficulty in getting surgeons.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

ARMY SURGEONS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9638) to increase the number of surgeons in the United States Army, to report it without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the number of medical officers of the Army be increased by the addition of fifteen assistant surgeons with the rank of first lieutenant, to be appointed after examination by an Army medical examining board, in accordance with existing regulations.

SEC. 2. That in emergencies the Surgeon-General of the Army, with the approval of the Secretary of War, may appoint as many contract surgeons as may be necessary, at a compensation not to exceed $150 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to have the bill read at length.

Mr. CULLOM. It has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read at length.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did not hear it, and I should like very much to have the bill again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read.

The bill was again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

ADULTERATED FOOD AND DRINK PRODUCTS.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield to the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON], who desires to have some business transacted. After that shall have been disposed of, I shall make the motion for an executive session.

Mr. CANNON. I send to the desk two resolutions, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first resolution submitted by the Senator from Utah will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas it is and has been for years publicly charged that in the manufacture of articles of food and drink many manufacturers of the United States, who transport their goods from one State to another, do most grossly adulterate such products, to the serious detriment of the public health and to the defrauding of purchasers: Now, therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and ascertain what, if any, manufacturers are adulterating food and drink products, and which, if any, of said products are deleterious to public health, and which, if any, of said products are frauds upon the purchasers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Utah if he cares to have the preamble adopted, which recites as matters of fact matters which may be doubtful? The resolution seems to be ample without the preamble.

Mr. CANNON. The preamble merely states that such charges are made. It does not state that they are true.

Mr. CHANDLER. After the resolution itself has been passed, I will call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the preamble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is, Shall the resolution pass?

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now I ask that the preamble may be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The preamble will be read.

The Secretary again read the preamble.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no special objection to the preamble, but I do not think it a good plan to put so many adjectives and adverbs into a preamble, such as "most grossly adulterated," or words of that character. If the Senator says he knows these charges have been going on all these years, then it is a true recital; but I have not noticed the fact, if the Senator has.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to agreeing to the preamble? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

COMBINATIONS OR TRUSTS IN MANUFACTURING.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I ask for the consideration of the second resolution, which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas it is publicly charged that certain manufacturers of the United States engaged in interstate commerce have entered into combination to control the manufacture and sale of certain articles of general consumption; and

Whereas such manufacturers are protected by law against competition in our markets from foreign manufacturers; and

Whereas it is contended by advocates of such combinations or trusts that their effect is to cheapen the cost of manufacturing and to cheapen the cost of such manufactures to the people; and

Whereas the laws of the United States prohibit the formation of trusts and combinations to control and limit the manufacture of articles of general consumption: Now, therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and make report to the Senate of its findings, showing whether or not combinations or trusts in manufacturing are operating in the United States; whether or not they are fostered by the existing tariff law; whether or not they are to the public advantage; whether or not their character is such as to bring them within the scope of the prohibitory laws; and if so, why they are not prosecuted and dissolved.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CANNON. May I inquire what became of the last resolution I submitted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last resolution has gone over under objection.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Chair state by whom the objection was made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

ST. JOHNS RIVER, FLORIDA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War is hereby requested to furnish Congress with information as to the condition of the St. Johns River in the State of Florida, at the point known as Orange Mills Flats, below the city of Palatka, as the river runs, with reference to navigation for ocean-going craft, and what sum of money will probably be required to put said river at that point in condition for navigation for coastwise craft such as usually enter the said river, and whether or not the expenditure necessary for said purpose will be justified by the traffic above said point.

Mr. PASCO. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution from the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 9, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 9, 1898.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The VICE-PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

On motion of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was dispensed with.

COMMODORE GEORGE DEWEY.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. H. CROOK, one of the Executive clerks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

On the 24th of April I directed the Secretary of the Navy to telegraph orders to Commodore George Dewey, of the United States Navy, commanding the Asiatic Squadron, then lying in the port of Hongkong, to proceed forthwith to the Philippine Islands, there to commence operations and engage the assembled Spanish fleet.

Promptly obeying that order, the United States squadron, consisting of the flagship Olympia, Baltimore, Raleigh, Boston, Concord, and Petrel, with the revenue-cutter McCulloch as an auxiliary dispatch boat, entered the harbor of Manila at daybreak on the 1st of May and immediately engaged the entire Spanish fleet of eleven ships, which were under the protection of the fire of the land forts. After a stubborn fight, in which the enemy suffered great loss, these vessels were destroyed or completely disabled and the water battery at Cavite silenced. Of our brave officers and men not one was lost and only eight injured, and those slightly. All of our ships escaped any serious damage.

By the 4th of May Commodore Dewey had taken possession of the naval station at Cavite, destroying the fortifications there and at the entrance of the bay, and paroling their garrisons. The waters of the bay are under his complete control. He has established hospitals within the American lines, where 250 of the Spanish sick and wounded are assisted and protected.

The magnitude of this victory can hardly be measured by the ordinary standard of naval warfare. Outweighing any material advantage is the moral effect of this initial success. At this unsurpassed achievement the great heart of our nation throbs, not with boasting or with greed of conquest, but with deep gratitude that this triumph has come in a just cause and that by the grace of God an effective stop has thus been taken toward the attainment of the wished-for peace. To those whose skill, courage, and devotion have won the fight, to the gallant commander and the brave officers and men who aided him, our country owes an incalculable debt.

Feeling as our people feel, and speaking in their name, I at once sent a message to Commodore Dewey, thanking him and his officers and men for their splendid achievement and overwhelming victory, and informing him that I had appointed him an acting rear-admiral.

I now recommend that following our national precedents and expressing the fervent gratitude of every patriotic heart, the thanks of Congress be given Acting Rear-Admiral George Dewey, of the United States Navy, for highly distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy, and to the officers and men under his command for their gallantry in the destruction of the enemy's fleet and the capture of the enemy's fortifications in the Bay of Manila.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 9, 1898.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it may be put on its passage.

The joint resolution (S. R. 102) tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore George Dewey, United States Navy, and to the officers and men of the squadron under his command, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in pursuance of the recommendation of the President, made in accordance with the provisions of section 1508 of the Revised Statutes, the thanks of Congress and of the American people are hereby tendered to Commodore George Dewey, United States Navy, commander in chief of the United States naval force on the Asiatic station, for highly distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy, as displayed by him in the destruction of the Spanish fleet and batteries in the harbor of Manila, Philippine Islands, May 1, 1898.

SEC. 2. That the thanks of Congress and the American people are hereby extended, through Commodore Dewey, to the officers and men under his command for the gallantry and skill exhibited by them on that occasion.

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States be requested to cause this resolution to be communicated to Commodore Dewey, and, through him, to the officers and men under his command.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is unanimous consent given for the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. QUAY. It seems to me that in view of the wonderful nature of the victory the joint resolution might go a little further. If the Senator from Maine does not object, I would suggest that he present an amendment directing that a sword be presented to Commodore Dewey and a medal of bronze to each of the men who served in his fleet.

Mr. HALE. Those are subjects-matter which will be treated later by a subsequent resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I have it here.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Massachusetts has a joint resolution that covers it.

Mr. QUAY. That ought to be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If no amendment be proposed, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. ALLEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWELL. As a pure matter of explanation, I ask the Senator from Maine whether the joint resolution confers the same honors on the officers and men that it confers on Commodore Dewey.

Mr. HALE. No; it is based upon section 1508, and the privileges that come from it by way of promotion apply only to the commander of the squadron, Commodore Dewey.

Mr. SEWELL. That is all I wanted to know. While I would not detract one iota from the credit to every officer and man, the Government of course can not pay to all the same honor.

Mr. HALE. It applies only, under the statute, to the officer who is named in the joint resolution; that is, Commodore Dewey.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to state that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has carefully worded the joint resolution in exact accordance with the precedents, in order that it may carry with it certain additional honors, as in similar cases in the past; and the language of the joint resolution ought not to be changed in any way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the passage of the joint resolution.

The secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], but as I believe he would vote in favor of the joint resolution, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is necessarily detained from the Senate. I am sure that if he were present, he would vote "yea." The Senator from Minnesota did right in voting.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to state in the hearing of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] that the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], with whom he is paired, is absent; but I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not refrain from voting on a measure of this sort, because the Senator from Alabama, if here, would vote "yea."

Mr. QUAY. I have already taken the liberty of voting. I voted "yea."

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I am sure he would vote "yea" if he were present. I therefore take the liberty of voting "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 67, nays 0; as follows:

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. FORAKER subsequently said: Mr. President, I was unfortunate enough to be detained at the War Department this morning until a few minutes after the meeting of the Senate, and during my absence the vote of thanks was extended in appreciation of the brilliant victory won by Commodore Dewey at Manila. It is impossible for me to have the RECORD so corrected as to enable me to vote, but I do wish to have the statement appear in the RECORD that if I had been here I should have taken great pleasure in voting in the affirmative.

Mr. MORGAN. I happened to be absent from the Senate also, and missed the opportunity of joining in the vote, which to me would have been one of the most delightful events in my life. I desire to be recorded in favor of the joint resolution, although the time has elapsed when I can properly have my vote recorded.

Mr. SHOUP. I desire to state that I also was detained at the War Department this morning, and was not present when the vote was taken, and I wish to have my name recorded as in favor of the joint resolution.

Mr. HALE. I introduce a bill which I ask may be put upon its passage.

The bill (S. 4555) fixing the number of rear-admirals in the United States Navy was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the number of rear-admirals in the United States Navy now allowed by law be, and is hereby, increased from six to seven, and this act shall be construed and taken as validating and making in force and effect any promotion to said rank of rear-admiral in the United States Navy made heretofore or hereafter and during the existing war and based upon the thanks of Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have an explanation as to the effect of the bill.

Mr. HALE. The number of rear-admirals in the Navy is now limited by law in specific terms to six, and it is doubtful whether under the general provision for advancing an officer one grade upon the thanks of Congress being tendered to him the President could make the appointment in view of the limitation. To save all possible question——

Mr. COCKRELL. One moment. This promotion does not go to rear-admirals?

Mr. HALE. This is a promotion of Commodore Dewey to be rear-admiral, he being a commodore now.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. HALE. And the resolution of thanks enables the President to appoint him, did he not find a barrier in the limitation to six. This is a bill to cure that difficulty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LODGE. I introduce a joint resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 163) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to present a sword of honor to Commodore George Dewey, and to cause to be struck bronze medals commemorating the battle of Manila Bay, and to distribute such medals to the officers and men of the ships of the Asiatic Squadron of the United States, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized to present a sword of honor to Commodore George Dewey, and to cause to be struck bronze medals commemorating the battle of Manila Bay, and to distribute such medals to the officers and men of the ships of the Asiatic Squadron of the United States under command of Commodore George Dewey on May 1, 1898, and that to enable the Secretary to carry out this resolution the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What reference shall be made of the message of the President of the United States?

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that it be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, pursuant to a clause in the sundry civil appropriation act of June 4, 1897, and of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act of March 15, 1898, relating to the purchase of law books, books of reference, etc., for the use of Departments, requesting the passage of a resolution

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask that the bill may be laid upon the table temporarily. I hope to call it up for action in the course of the afternoon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, that will be the order.

JAIL AT FORT SMITH, ARK.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5321) declaring the Federal jail at the city of Fort Smith, Ark., a national prison for certain purposes, to report it favorably without amendment. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] to the report.

Mr. BERRY. That is a very short bill, and it is important that it should pass at once. It is a House bill, and there can be no objection to it. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

Mr. CARTER. By direction of the Committee on Census, I report back favorably the bill (S. 4545) to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and I submit a report thereon. The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the substitution on the Calendar of Senate bill 4545 for Senate bill 94? The Chair hears no objection, and the substitution is made. Shall Senate bill 4545 take the place of Senate bill 94 as unfinished business?

Mr. CARTER. Let it take its place on the Calendar as the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no objection, that will be the order. The question is on the indefinite postponement of Senate bill 94. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is indefinitely postponed.

POST-OFFICES AT MILITARY POSTS OR CAMPS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4554) to authorize the establishment of post-offices at military posts or camps, to report it with amendments, and to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, in section 1, line 3, after the word "of," to strike out the words "hostilities between the United States and Spain" and insert "the existing war;" so as to read:

That during the continuance of the existing war the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, establish a temporary post-office at any military post or camp for the purpose of supplying the officers and troops there encamped with mails, the location of which post-office may at any time be changed to any other post or camp. On the establishment of such post-office he shall cooperate with the Secretary of War or officer commanding such post or camp for the purpose of securing the detail of an officer of the Regular or Volunteer Army of suitable rank to act as postmaster, who shall, when the exigency will permit, execute a bond to the United States as such, and of a sufficient number of noncommissioned officers and privates to act as clerks in said post-office, who shall serve as such without additional salary, pay, or compensation other than that attaching to their rank and position in the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 1, after the word "act," in line 19, to insert "after the postmaster shall have given bond as required by law;" so as to read:

In any case where it is deemed impracticable by the military authorities to detail persons from the Army to act as postmaster or clerks the Postmaster-General is authorized to appoint a civilian as postmaster, and also to make a special order allowing to him reasonable compensation for clerical services and to meet the necessary expenses of said office, as well as a proportionate increase of salary to the postmaster during the period of such extraordinary business as may attach to his office, under the provisions of section 3683, Revised Statutes, payable out of the appropriations for the postal service. He may also provide for the issue and payment of money orders at any post-office established under the provisions of this act, after the postmaster shall have given bond as required by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably a resolution submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] on April 7, authorizing the Committee on Foreign Relations to employ for the remainder of this session an additional clerk. I ask immediate consideration for the resolution, as the committee is very much in need of additional clerical assistance.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be authorized to employ for the remainder of this session an additional clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $1,440 per annum.

ANN M. SPENCER.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution submitted by Mr. SPOONER March 21, 1898, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay Ann M. Spencer, mother of William Ensor Spencer, deceased, late Minute and Journal Clerk of the Senate, a sum equal to one year's salary at the rate allowed by law to said Minute and Journal Clerk, out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate; said payment to be considered as in lieu of all funeral expenses or other allowances.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the resolution in relation to Mrs. Spencer, and that it be recommitted to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

COMBINATIONS OR TRUSTS IN MANUFACTURING.

Mr. CANNON. If the morning business is completed, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate resolution No. 358, now upon the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolution No. 358, offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] on Friday last and laid over. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CANNON on the 6th instant, as follows:

Whereas it is publicly charged that certain manufacturers of the United States engaged in interstate commerce have entered into combination to control the manufacture and sale of certain articles of general consumption; and

Whereas such manufacturers are protected by law against competition in our markets from foreign manufacturers; and

Whereas it is contended by advocates of such combinations or trusts that their effect is to cheapen the cost of manufacturing and to cheapen the cost of such manufactures to the people; and

Whereas the laws of the United States prohibit the formation of trusts and combinations to control and limit the manufacture of articles of general consumption: Now, therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and make report to the Senate of its findings, showing whether or not combinations or trusts in manufacturing are operating in the United States; whether or not they are fostered by the existing tariff law; whether or not they are to the public advantage; whether or not their character is such as to bring them within the scope of the prohibitory laws; and if so, why they are not prosecuted and dissolved.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that the resolution be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it strikes me that this is a very comprehensive resolution. My attention was not called to it until this moment. Possibly it is wise that it should be passed—I am not prepared to say that it is not—and yet if this investigation is to be had it is very evident that it will require some clerical force and some money to carry it on to a reasonable conclusion.

The allegation is that somebody has publicly charged that certain manufacturers of the United States engaged in interstate commerce have entered into a combination to control the manufacture and sale of certain articles, and that they are protected by law against competition in our markets from foreign manufacturers. I do not understand that anybody has contended heretofore that the tariff law (and I presume that is what the resolution refers to) absolutely protects American manufacturers from competition. I think the claim has been that it places them upon a plane where they can compete with foreign manufacturers, but not that it gives them control of our American market. Then the Committee on Manufactures is authorized and directed to investigate and make report to the Senate of its findings based upon the allegations in the preamble to the resolution.

Mr. President, I know very little about these combinations. I know very little about the so-called trusts. I have an impression that a great deal has been said about them that is not true, and possibly an investigation of this kind would develop that fact. It might be to the interests of the manufacturers to have an investigation made. But it does seem to me that we ought not to enter upon the inquiry without giving it due consideration and fully understanding what is contemplated by the mover of the resolution, possibly by the committee that will have the investigation in charge. I should like to hear some explanation of the resolution, its purpose, its scope, and the results that are expected to be reached by the Senator from Utah, before action is taken on the resolution. Possibly after he makes his statement I may have a word further to say in reference to it.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I objected to the consideration of this resolution on Friday last when it was introduced, and it escaped my attention since then. I have not had time to look at it or read it. I do not know that I object to it, because I think the investigation proposed by the Senator from Utah will have probably a salutary result in that it will demonstrate to the country that the insinuations and charges mentioned in the preamble are not true. But I should be very glad, as the Post-Office appropriation bill is to come up to-day, if the Senator would allow it to go over until to-morrow, that I may have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. CANNON. I will offer an alternative proposition to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the resolution go to the Committee on Manufactures for consideration and report to the Senate, if that course will be more satisfactory.

Mr. QUAY. That course is entirely satisfactory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Before the reference is made, I wish to say one word about resolutions for investigation. I do not think they ought to contain preambles which make wholesale charges without facts upon which they are based. I trust that if the Committee on Manufactures shall report a resolution, they will not ask us to vote for allegations of this sort, which a good many of us do not believe.

Mr. CANNON. If the Senator from Connecticut will carefully examine the resolution, he will see that it makes no charge against anybody. It is simply a recital of a fact that is currently known everywhere outside of the Senate Chamber, that charges have been made publicly that combinations of this sort exist. I care nothing whatever for the preamble; and the Committee on Manufactures, if reference shall be made, will, no doubt, present to the Senate a resolution which will meet with general approval here.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to be allowed to make a suggestion to the Senator from Utah, who I see is a member of the Committee on Manufactures, that will consider the propriety of making this investigation. I suggest whether, if the subject of trusts and combinations is to be investigated, it ought not to extend beyond the trusts and combination in connection with manufactured products. There are trusts of all sorts, and the question of national interference and prohibition in connection with trusts is a very broad one.

I do not intend to object, I will say to the Senator, to any investigation of trusts in articles which are the subjects of interstate commerce, but I do not quite like to have a discrimination made between trusts in manufactures and trusts in other products. If there are illegal trusts and combinations in connection with any subject of human industry, whether in connection with agriculture or with mining, or in connection with manufactures, they ought to be investigated; but I submit to the Senator that he ought not to single out one product, manufactures, and commence an investigation into the subject of trusts and combinations in connection with those manufactures.

I certainly think the Senator ought to leave out the preamble unless he submits to the Senate evidence of the truth of the alleged facts stated in the preamble.

Mr. CANNON. I have no doubt that can be arranged if a reference is made.

Mr. QUAY. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Manufactures. They can lick it into shape to the satisfaction of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. I think we shall be able to agree upon a satisfactory report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

The motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4108) granting to the Washington Improvement and Development Company a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SHOUP, Mr. MANTLE, and Mr. WILSON were appointed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9008) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, the pending question being on the amendments submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW, on page 8, line 6, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1898, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 20 per cent per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight heretofore fixed and allowed by law.

Mr. FAULKNER resumed the speech begun by him on Friday last. After having spoken for some time,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2680) amending "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that that bill be informally laid aside until the pending appropriation bill is finished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KYLE. That order being waived, I believe my special order for 2 o'clock is next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first special order before the Senate is the joint resolution (S. R. 83) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. Is that the measure the Senator from South Dakota is interested in?

Mr. KYLE. It is not.

Mr. SPOONER. There was a special order made by unanimous consent a few days ago at the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] for to-day, being Senate bill 3662, concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has that before him now. That is the next in order after Senate joint resolution 83.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will allow that bill to be laid aside also.

Mr. KYLE. I will agree to have it laid aside until after the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CULLOM. The appropriation bills are in order before any other business, ordinarily. The pending bill has now been on hand for some days, and we have, by unanimous consent, agreed to vote upon it to-day.

Mr. KYLE. I understand that the bill I have in charge will require but a very few moments—not over ten minutes, probably. It is a House bill; it was passed unanimously last Thursday in the House, and will pass through the Senate without any discussion. There are one or two nominal amendments to be made.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator in charge of the pending bill is not in at this moment, but I hope there will be no interference with the appropriation bill, in view of the fact that we have, by unanimous consent, agreed to vote upon it before adjournment to-day.

Mr. KYLE. I will waive the order until the Senator from West Virginia finishes his speech.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the special order is laid aside without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without prejudice. The special order will be taken up as soon as the Senator from West Virginia has completed his remarks.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I think it is best to call attention also now to the fact that we agreed last Friday that by unanimous consent the Post-Office appropriation bill should be disposed of to-day. Of course, if any other order is to come in to disturb that unanimous agreement and cut off debate——

Mr. CULLOM. It can not do it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Then the unanimous-consent agreement will have to be waived.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the unanimous-consent agreement can not be interfered with consistently with the honor of the Senate. Every Senator understands that that is the order of the day until it is disposed of, and any special order would necessarily be set aside, I think, by the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is no question about that.

Mr. CULLOM. So I hope the Senator from South Dakota will waive it.

Mr. KYLE. If under the arrangement made last Friday with reference to the bill under consideration, it is to continue under discussion until it is finished this afternoon, I will waive the special order until to-morrow at 2 o'clock, if that is satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. It was the understanding that the Post-Office appropriation bill should be disposed of to-day before adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks that Senate bill 3662 be continued and be made the special order for to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SPOONER. It is possible that the Post-Office appropriation bill will be finished and the bill which the Senator has charge of can be taken up later in the day.

Mr. FAULKNER. Let it come up as soon as the Post-Office appropriation bill is finished.

Mr. SPOONER. Let it go over until after the Post-Office appropriation bill is finished.

Mr. KYLE. Very well.

Mr. CULLOM. That is the only order I desire to have made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and the request is granted. There is another special order also before the Senate, being the joint resolution (S. R. 83) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Is the same motion made in regard to that special order?

Mr. SPOONER. By whom was it reported?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. CULLOM. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has just sent word that he desires that the joint resolution shall be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. SPOONER. Then let it be laid aside in the same way as the bill which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] has in charge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will take that course unless there is objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 10251) fixing the number of rear-admirals in the United States Navy; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 260) tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore George Dewey, United States Navy, and to the officers and men of the squadron under his command.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9008) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned on last Friday I was discussing the carrying of mail by postal cars. I had referred—and I do not desire to repeat myself—to the laws governing the compensation of the railroad companies based upon weight, also to the law fixing the compensation for postal railway cars, and had explained to the Senate the number of routes on which those cars are used, as well as the number of cars in use by the Government.

There is only one additional reference which I desire to make in closing my remarks on this branch of the discussion, and that is to quote from the remarks of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, made in the investigation held by the Committee on Appropriations at the last session of Congress, in which he explained to some extent the advantage in the use of these cars. He said:

> Some day, if I live long enough, I hope to show you how the car and wagon will dispense with the big city post-offices. The postmaster at New York said to me a few days ago that if we were not doing what we are doing on wheels he could not handle his mail in New York. The cars are doing so much separation that you will have to have a great deal larger post-office buildings in the cities were it not for these cars.

The same officer, emphasizing the importance to the Department of the use of these traveling post-offices, said, in his report of 1896, as follows:

> Marked as is the improvement in the rapid transit of mails, effected through the combined efforts of the Department and the carriers, perhaps the most noteworthy feature of the service is the extent to which the distribution in the railway post-offices is now carried. No longer content with delivering into the larger post-offices the mail addressed thereto, the railway post-office now separates and arranges, for immediate delivery by the letter carriers in the larger cities, an immense and constantly increasing volume of mail to the extent of making it almost possible to supply the letter carriers from the postal car on its arrival with the mail intended for their personal distribution, which practically eliminates a very large amount of work that was formerly done in the post-office buildings.

These remarks of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General have been fully verified and I believe are fully concurred in by the Department since they were made to the Senate a year ago.

Mr. President, last Friday in discussing the cost of mail transportation I used an expression, which has been misunderstood by some, to the effect that if the pending amendment was adopted, arbitrarily cutting down the rate of compensation 20 per cent for the transportation of the mails by railroads, it would be "ruinous." Some understood that term to apply to the railroads that would be affected. Such was not my meaning. I was alluding to the effect it would have upon the mail service on those roads.

I stated that the evidence before the committee was that in the Southern States 28 per cent of those routes were what may properly be termed messenger-service routes, on which compensation was not based upon the weight of the mail, but arbitrarily fixed by law, the highest compensation permitted by law being allowed, although it was really inadequate for the services rendered by the small railroad companies over which it passed, and that on those routes the service would be affected most materially and prejudicially; that in my own State so many of the routes are of the character described I felt called upon to protest against the adoption of the amendment.

I listened to the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], made on last Friday, with pleasure, as I always do; but after an examination of them in cold print I must say he is one of the most ingenious manipulators of figures that I have ever had the honor of meeting in debate; and I think when you take his figures and examine them carefully Senators will find that he has been misled in reaching his conclusions because of the error of his premises.

Mr. President, we will take up the first statement found in the RECORD on page 5218, in which he pretends to give the weight of mail, the compensation, and the rate per pound. He bases his calculation upon the figures furnished him by the Department, leaving out about 8,000,000 pounds of mail weight in his calculation and failing to take into consideration in ascertaining his result the 20 per cent of additional weight, to which his attention is especially called in the communication.

In other words, if his calculation had been based upon the letter sent to him by the Department, instead of basing his calculations on 520,000,000 pounds of mail carried, he should have made them on weights of over 630,000,000 pounds of mail carried in 1897. Why is this true? For the reason that all free mail is eliminated from the aggregate of the number of pounds weight on which his calculations rest and also all the weight of equipment, the mail bags, and so forth, which enter into and form a part of the weight, which determines the compensation of the railroads. The fact that the Government does not choose to charge for a certain class of matter, but declares it free, can not affect the rights of the carrier to a fair compensation on the weight carried. That is a matter over which the carrier has no control, but over which Congress alone exercises supreme control.

But, Mr. President, let us assume that the figures of the Senator from South Dakota are correct. By dividing compensation by the weight we will find that the cost to the Government for transporting the mail is 5¼ cents per pound for weight carried. I would ask the Senator from South Dakota to state to the Senate, over what distance does the charge of 5¼ cents paid to the railroad carry the mail? Is it for a distance of 1 mile, or is it for 3,000 miles, or for what number of miles is this compensation paid?

Mr. President, the evidence before the committee shows that it does cost the Government on an average, taking into consideration the small and the large routes, 5.27 cents to carry a pound of mail, not 1 mile, not 3,000 miles, but a distance of 328 miles. The figures will show—but the Senator from South Dakota failed to call it to the attention of the Senate—that the cost of 5¼ cents per pound, which is the result of his calculations, is the cost for carrying the mail an average distance of 328 miles. At that rate, to carry it 1 mile it cost the Government of the United States less than one-sixth of a mill per pound per mile.

It seemed to me proper to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota and the Senate to the fact that when the average distance was added as an element of calculation the result would show the real cost of carrying the mail, and remove the impression that it cost 5¼ of a cent per pound per mile. If I am in error I should be very glad to be corrected by the Senator.

On page 5221 of the RECORD the Senator, after ascertaining what it costs to carry the mail by weight per pound and fixing it at 5¼ of a cent, regardless of the average distance carried, follows with this statement:

> The express companies carried 3,262,000,000 pounds of express matter, not counting the 17,000,000 packages of valuable matter. Giving them the benefit as far as weight is concerned and throwing in the 17,000,000 packages of valuable matter, we find that they paid the railroads for transporting everything $19,327,000, which is 5¾¾ mills per pound. In other words, the railroad companies received for transporting express matter in 1890 one-tenth what we paid per pound for carrying mail matter last year, giving them the benefit, throwing in the weight of all the 17,000,000 of valuable packages. The express companies paid a little less than 6 mills per pound, while the United States paid for carrying the mails a little less than 6 cents per pound.

Mr. President, I would ask the Senator from South Dakota what distance carried does that 5¾¾ mills represent? He says that the common carrier hauls the express traffic for 5¾¾ mills per pound. But over what average distance is the pound carried?

Mr. PETTIGREW. That amount was ascertained by dividing the total amount of compensation by the number of pounds shipped. I asked the president of the express company what was the average haul of express matter, but I could not secure the information, and have been unable to secure it. Just what the average distance is that express matter is carried, I do not know.

Mr. FAULKNER. To make a comparison between the cost of mail and express transportation it was essential to ascertain the average haul.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the Senator will permit me, I will say in that connection there is such a great similarity between express matter and mail matter that I presume there is a great similarity in the average haul of the packages. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General or the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service calculates that the average haul of mail matter is 328 miles. However, without reference to the distance they carry, more or less, great or small, they pay, I should say, for the carriage less than six-tenths of a cent a pound.

Mr. FAULKNER. Assuming, Mr. President, that the figures of the Senator from South Dakota for the year 1890, found on page 5218 of the RECORD, are correct, they show that the weight of mail matter was 326,000,000 pounds and the compensation $21,000,000, as against the carriage by the carrier for the express companies of 3,262,000,000 pounds at a cost of $19,327,000, which would be one-tenth of the carriage of the number of pounds of express matter. If, therefore, the cost for carrying the mail is as stated by the Senator, and we assume that the average carriage of express matter is 32 miles, it would show that the cost of the mail service and the cost of express transportation was the same.

If that average distance were 16 miles, the cost, even under the figures of the Senator from South Dakota, would be just double the cost of carrying the mails. This illustrates the importance, when a Senator proposes to furnish information to the Senate, that all the elements essential to a right and proper conclusion should be presented, that a true comparison may be made.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FAULKNER. With pleasure.

Mr. SEWELL. My recollection of the statement of the Senator from South Dakota is to the effect that he stated that the Department paid six-tenths of a cent. I do not doubt, as the Senator says, he made a mistake, for the amount is six-tenths of a mill, not six-tenths of a cent.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I have taken the figures of the Senator from South Dakota, the calculation he makes, and by simply applying the principle of the average distance of the haul, to show that with a 32-mile haul the cost is the same as that paid by the United States for carrying the mail; and if the average distance hauled is but 16 miles, it is double that amount.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I would say if the distance were 1 mile, it would be still more.

Mr. FAULKNER. This illustrates the errors my friend from South Dakota has innocently fallen into in his attempt to show that the Government is paying largely in excess of what is paid by the express companies for the transportation of their goods, but in addition to this a great many other facts must be taken into consideration. He fails to appreciate the cost assumed by the express companies in the transportation of their freight, involved in their expenditure in paying not the carrier, but the employees of the railroad for services rendered it. This item is not taken into consideration in any calculation the Senator has given of the compensation paid by the express companies to the carrier.

The evidence before the committee shows that large amounts in addition to the direct payments are made to the carriers by the express companies for compensation to the employees of the roads who handle its freight, the sum to baggage masters being specific and definite, while a commission is paid to the station agent who takes charge of its business. On one road the positive statement is made that it amounted to $110,000 a year; on another road, to $53,000. Those are the only two items which I believe have been definitely stated, but the practice is the same on all roads.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The information with regard to the length of the haul of express matter to the amount paid the railroad companies, from all the facts within the control of the express companies and the railroad companies, all through the investigation, I strove to get, but failed to do so. They are the persons who can furnish it. Why do they not furnish it? What is the use of drawing imaginary parallels and presuming or supposing the length of the route is 16 or 32 miles, or that they pay so much to the baggagemen, agents, etc. Why do they not bring in the facts? I am ready to be convinced if they can satisfy me that they are carrying the mail for a just compensation, and I am willing they should be justly compensated.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is not necessary for me to tell the Senator from South Dakota, for he knows the reason why the facts referred to are not contained in the record as well as I do. Those reasons were given to him by the witnesses when he asked them the same questions which he has now submitted to me, which was that the express companies pay no attention to the question of weight, and the carrier pays no attention to this question in their dealings the one with the other. The question of weight is only a matter of interest to the express company in fixing the rate to be paid by the individual shipping.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Just one moment, Mr. President, in that connection. I asked Mr. Weir this question:

> Do you pay any expense whatever before accounting to the railroads for 40 per cent of the gross receipts?
> Mr. WEIR. Do you mean, do we deduct anything from it?
> Senator PETTIGREW. Yes.
> Mr. WEIR. No.
> Senator PETTIGREW. Nothing whatever?
> Mr. WEIR. Nothing whatever.
> Senator PETTIGREW. You pay to the railroad company 40 per cent of the gross receipts, and there is no item deducted before that is paid?
> Mr. WEIR. That is right.
> Senator CULLOM. What express company do you represent?
> Mr. WEIR. The Adams.
> Senator PETTIGREW. How much expense would it be to gather all your waybills and get this information for which I asked you?
> Mr. WEIR. I suppose it would take 100 men three months to get it.
> Senator PETTIGREW. Would you be willing to have that done?
> Mr. WEIR. Personally I do not see any objection, but without the authority of my board of directors I would not promise to do it. I see no objection to it, however.
> Senator PETTIGREW. Did your company furnish the information for the census authorities in 1890?
> Mr. WEIR. I think we furnished some information. I am not certain about it.

Mr. FAULKNER. Your quotation from the census report shows that there were two companies that failed to make any return, and that the aggregate amount of weight and the aggregate amount of compensation is not, therefore, given for the whole country.

But, Mr. President, I was speaking of the fact that the Senator knew that in answer to his question the president of the express company informed him that it would take 100 clerks three months to prepare an answer to the question the Senator has asked me, the same which he asked of the president of the Adams Express Company. It was partially for that reason that the committee reported in favor of the adoption of the amendment for an investigation of the whole subject, that ample time and opportunity should be given for the ascertainment of the facts on which the action of the Senate could with justice and fairness rest.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, everyone who deals with figures knows, while it might take 100 men three months to go over every waybill and ascertain the weight of every package, that with one-tenth or even one-twentieth of that effort and expense of time and service they could arrive at the weight approximately; and the president of the Adams Express Company knows, as well as the Senator from West Virginia, that by taking a week every two months through the year, or taking a day or two each month in the year and figuring it up, they would get approximately the weight carried; and it would not take 100 clerks three months to do it. While it might require it to go over every single waybill and figure up every single item, if they wanted to furnish this information they could do it at almost no expense whatever.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from South Dakota is still unfair and unjust in his remarks. He did not ask the president of that company whether during the next year he would adopt the suggestions he made and take two days each month to find this out and average it. He said, "How long will it take you to furnish this committee the evidence of the number of pounds carried by the express companies in this whole country?" He answered that it would take a hundred clerks three months to do it. It is therefore unfair for him to say that it could be done by averaging it two days for each month during the year. It is not a fair way to treat the Senate or the witness who was before us and who gave us all the information in his possession without any hesitation whatever, promptly answering all questions submitted to him by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. President, there is another statement to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In this connection I think perhaps there had better go into the RECORD what occurred.

Mr. FAULKNER. I did not yield for a speech. The Senator can ask me a question.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I merely want to put into the RECORD three or four questions and answers in this connection.

Mr. QUAY. His entire testimony is in the RECORD.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I know it is. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said to me:

> Have you got all the information you wanted?

I replied:

> All I can get; not all I wanted. Mr. Weir has been very fair about it.
> Mr. WEIR. Is it about the contracts that you are not fully satisfied?
> Senator PETTIGREW. Oh, no; I should like to know the weight of packages and the number of packages.
> Mr. WEIR. I see; you want to make a comparison?
> Senator PETTIGREW. Yes.

Mr. FAULKNER. There is no doubt, I think, that the Senator wanted to make a comparison, but when he could not get any basis upon which to make it, he then assumed his bases regardless of the facts. That is the way I understand the case.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I made it on the census of 1890, and Mr. Weir corroborated that census by his testimony.

Mr. FAULKNER. He did not corroborate it. He did not even state positively whether his company made a return or anything about it, but thought perhaps it did. As to whether it was a certain, accurate ascertainment of the facts, there was no evidence whatever before the committee. But I have assumed that his figures were correct; and taking those figures, I have shown what the result is if the average route of carrying the express is 32 miles, as under the testimony of Mr. Weir it could not be more than that, as he admitted that the great bulk of its business was done within four or five hundred miles of the point from which it was shipped; and it is a fact known to every Senator that express in bulk is never sent from New York to San Francisco or to any distant Western points. It is always sent, when in bulk, by fast freight, as it would be impossible to pay the express rates on it for such a distance.

But there is another matter to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota. I think it unfair and unjust to attempt to impugn the motives and to assail the conduct of a public official on the facts upon which he rests his assault. The Senator, in order to ridicule the Postmaster-General, in discussing the rate given by him for carrying express per 100 pounds from New York to San Francisco at $15, while the mails were being carried between the same points for $11.65 per 100 pounds, said, in substance: "He was trying to deceive the committee, because he knew that when you took the 40 per cent off the $15, as the amount that was actually paid the carrier, the compensation was only $6 per 100 pounds from New York to San Francisco instead of $15, and in comparison with the cost of the mail, it is the difference between $6 and $11.65." I again ask the Senator from South Dakota upon what basis he asserts to the Senate that the express company pays only $6 for carrying the 100 pounds between New York and San Francisco?

Mr. PETTIGREW. On the testimony of Mr. Weir, that they pay 40 per cent of their gross earnings.

Mr. FAULKNER. There was no such testimony before us.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly there was.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator again assumes his facts. But in his answer to my question he has stated the evidence as it was given to the committee, which was that they pay from 40 to 60 per cent of their gross receipts to the carrier. With that let us assume a case to show what the cost of transportation paid to the railroad might be in carrying express matter between these points. Suppose there is a hundred pounds of ordinary matter, carried at $15 per hundredweight from New York to San Francisco, and that in the same car which carries the hundredweight of express matter there is a safe carrying 10 pounds of matter on which the express charge is $7.75 per pound.

Then there would be in that car 110 pounds of express matter, yielding to the company on the 10 pounds over $77. Forty per cent of it added to $6 on the 100 pounds of ordinary express matter would make a payment to the company on the 110 pounds of freight of what? Not $6, but $37. Thirty-seven dollars would therefore be the amount paid to the carrier under the assumed state of facts which I have given and which I have a right to assume, because they do carry money and do carry valuable packages in connection with their ordinary express matter, for which they charge $7.75. That was a very unfair statement. It is not from the payment of 40 or 50 per cent on $15 that the carrier receives its compensation, but it is the 40 or 50 or 60 per cent on the amount of gross receipts earned by the company from all sources in handling express matter and paid before any deduction for any cause is made. In the illustration I have given, instead of there being a payment of $7 for the 110 pounds carried, it would have been $37 received by the company as against the payment of about $12.50 per 110 pounds of mail. This shows the unfairness of the attack upon the Second Assistant Postmaster-General by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to say that along with the money packages the railroad carries an iron safe. I do not know how much it weighs.

Mr. FAULKNER. Neither do I, but I know and the Senator knew when he made the illustration to the Senate, that it was not simply the $6 out of the $15 that was paid by the express company, but that the carriers' compensation was on the gross receipts of high as well as low rates of express.

Mr. President, when the Senator's attention is called to the statement which I will read, he will, I hope, disclaim the language which he used. On page 5222 he said:

> But what is worse in this statement you will find by turning to page 137, I will show how worthless this whole testimony is. On that page you will find a statement of Mr. White, the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, in which he says that we pay for carrying the mail over the New York Central road from New York to Chicago $2,873,518 per year, and the weight is 66,500,000 pounds, or $4.33 per 100 pounds, while the Second Assistant Postmaster-General says, comparing it with the express rates, we pay $3.51 per 100 pounds.
> Of course $3.51 to a man who is working for a railroad company, and wants to make out a case for it, makes a better comparison with $2.25 than $4.33 makes.

In the first place, the Senator will not find the statement on page 137 in the form in which he has given it. He has worked the figures out himself, and in doing so his attention must have been called to the fact that in the case of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General he was giving the cost of mail by weight, without regard to the cost of the postal railway car service between those two points, and in the other case Mr. White was giving the calculation based upon the aggregate cost of both weight and postal-car service.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What does the Senator say, that in comparing the express rate with the mail rate——

Mr. FAULKNER. I said that the Senator from South Dakota had stated that this discrepancy was proof of improper influence exerted on the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in giving his statement to the committee, when he was giving the cost per hundred pounds of mail by weight carried, while in the case of Mr. White, with which the Senator compared it, he was giving the aggregate cost of weight as well as postal-car service.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In comparing the cost of carrying a pound of mail from New York to Chicago with the cost of carrying a pound of express matter, it is rather natural to suppose that the whole cost is included.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator himself excluded it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. However, if that is the explanation, I am willing to accept it as an explanation; but I shall not take back anything that I said in this connection, if that is all there is to the explanation.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from West Virginia will allow me, the Senator should look at pages 136 and 137, where he will see that it would make but a few cents difference according to which way we calculate it, because the pay for mail is $2,441,240.89. The amount for postal cars is less than a half million dollars—$432,000.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from North Carolina does not seem to appreciate at all the point I have suggested to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is not whether the difference is little or great. It is a question of a Senator of the United States rising on the floor of the Senate and imputing, by reason of that difference, improper actions and motives to a public official when there are no grounds on which the statement can rest.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from West Virginia can not make that statement, if he wants to be fair himself, without at the same time admitting that the discrepancy would be very great in favor of the express company, the pay much larger, even if we were to figure it as the Senator says it ought to be figured, and I will figure it out and give him the exact result.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from North Carolina knows that the Senator from West Virginia was not even referring to the difference in cost between mail and express between New York and Chicago, but he was simply calling the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the statement he made which reflected upon the honesty, the honor, and the integrity of a public official, based upon a state of facts that does not exist and to which the Senator from West Virginia desired to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota, so that he could disclaim the charge and imputation which he made against the character of that official.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is again wrong. He says on a fact that does not exist. The fact does exist.

Mr. FAULKNER. It does not exist.

Mr. BUTLER. I will give the Senator the figures to show that approximately it exists as the Senator from South Dakota stated it. The discrepancy is large. I am figuring it out now. It does exist, and the facts will show, as the Senator says it ought to be calculated——

Mr. FAULKNER. To carry it out, it would be the difference between $3.57 and $3.67. There is a difference, of course, between the cost of carrying mail without the cost of the postal-car service and carrying the mail with the postal-car service. No one disputes that proposition.

Mr. PETTIGREW. When I made the statement, I made all the apology that I want to make now for what the Senator from West Virginia has stated. I should like to read it. It is only a line:

> Of course $3.51 to a man who is working for a railroad company, and wants to make out a case for it, makes a better comparison with $2.25 than $4.33 makes. I do not know that this is done purposely, but I presume it is figured out by subordinates. I believe Mr. Shallenberger, so far as he is concerned, is an honest man; but I do believe that he has been deceived in this statement; I know it, for the railroad companies have furnished the material to the subordinates, who were trained under the two previous Second Assistant Postmasters-General, who were railroad employees, and consequently we can not get at the truth from that Department until it is wiped out, the service changed, and every one of those fellows turned out and a new crop put in.

I have no apology for that statement.

Mr. FAULKNER. That is as unjust and as improper an imputation on the subordinate as it was upon the Assistant Postmaster-General. One of those subordinate officers has been in the service of the Government for thirty-five years, the other for seventeen years. One is an honorably discharged wounded soldier, lame in his left arm to an extent which makes it absolutely useless, and his services have been of such value to the Government that no Administration has ever felt that it would be justified in discharging him from the service or in transferring him from this particular work.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota last Friday discussed the rates of the passenger, express, and freight service and compared each with the cost of the transportation of the mail under the law as it now exists. I do not think any of those subjects can be fairly compared on any parallel ground with the cost of the transportation of the mail. But we have no other subject of comparison, and we are therefore necessarily thrown back to accept them as the only subjects with which a comparison can be made.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me?

Mr. FAULKNER. No; I do not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator can put his figures into his own speech when he follows me.

Mr. BUTLER. I will do so.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am afraid they may be wrong, and therefore I do not care to have them inserted as a part of my remarks.

Mr. BUTLER. I protest against the Senator making any such statement. It is unworthy of the Senator.

Mr. FAULKNER. I hope the Senator does not feel that I charge him with intentional wrong. I assume that the Senator, like many of us, is not as quick and bright at mathematics as when he left school, and when we get problems involving decimals and fractions, in the hurry of a calculation on the floor of the Senate during a debate it is more than probable that the result will be inaccurate.

Mr. BUTLER. This is a very important matter, and I suppose the Senator from West Virginia wants to get at the facts, and certainly if he does——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator wants to get at the facts he can test my calculation and I will give the whole process.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will see that when I hear the Senator's speech.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator ought to allow it to go in now after what he has said. On page 137 the statement shows——

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, in making a comparison between any services we ought to look at what service is rendered by the carriers for the compensation that is paid. In considering that question there will be found many differences between the passenger, express, and freight service in a comparison with the mail service. In the first place, we know that the mail service is not the subject of contract; it is controlled by the law which fixes the compensation, and the obligations and duties and responsibilities of the common carrier are fixed by the regulations of the Department. In one case, therefore, we have always a subject of contract between two parties. In the other case we have the definite, fixed, and unalterable provision of law to govern and control the parties.

Contracts for freight, passenger, and express are based upon the cost of the service, and no common carrier would accept either passengers, express matter, or freight below the cost of carrying. Consequently, as a matter of contract, they first ascertain the cost of transportation and fix the price based upon the ascertainment of that fact. With mail the Government fixes the rate both to the citizen and the carrier without regard to the question of cost.

There is another difference in reference to these services. The Government of the United States has the right to designate upon what trains its mail shall be carried, and it has the right to prescribe how many postal cars shall be carried upon any of the trains run by the postal carrier. It is absolutely within the control of the Department. There is no such privilege given to anyone else.

The Senator from South Dakota or the Senator from North Carolina, I do not know which, asked me Friday whether the mail was carried on the Chicago limited. I informed him at the time that I did not know whether such was the case or not. But upon examination of the evidence I find that the testimony before the subcommittee was that the mail is carried upon the Chicago limited. It is in the testimony of Mr. Shallenberger, where Mr. WHITE corrects him in reference to that particular matter. The Department has in this matter the absolute control, to designate the particular train and the amount of mail that shall go on that train.

What is the case as to express matter. Express matter must be hauled on mail trains, but on such trains as the company may designate and not such as the express company may prefer. In some instances they may reject express matter at the different stations as they pass along, as in the case of the joint use of compartment cars.

It is within the discretion of the company, if the baggage fills the space which would otherwise be given to express matter, to occupy that space to its exclusion. Again, there is an obligation assumed by the carrier that at all stations and junction points where the post-office or the transfer is within one-quarter of a mile the employees of the railroad are required to receive the mail from the train, carry it to the post-office, and bring the mail from the post-office to the train, and also carry it from one junctional point to the other. That occurs at 20,000 post-offices in this country. The Post-Office Department has estimated the cost to the Government in doing this work at 7,000 offices at over $1,000,000.

The Senator from South Dakota, in order to show how inaccurate and unreliable the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was in all his calculations, made a calculation upon some assumption—I do not know what—to show that the actual cost to the Government was one million seven hundred and odd thousand dollars. The actual cost of that service to the Government is between $1,000,000 and $1,100,000. So he was not as inaccurate as the Senator from South Dakota when he said (without having his attention drawn to it so as to examine the figures) that it was over a million dollars.

The Senator proceeds to argue (from a basis of calculation which he has made) that the cost to the railroads in doing this particular service is nine hundred and odd thousand dollars. What is the evidence of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General on that subject? We certainly have a right to rely upon his opinion, unless the view of the Senator from South Dakota is entertained by every member of the Senate that he is in fact a tool of these corporations. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General says that in his judgment the cost to these companies would be about $3,000,000. The estimate of the railroad officials is that the cost is fully $4,000,000.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FAULKNER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The only evidence we had in regard to the cost of transporting mails from the trains to the post-offices was in connection with the Louisville and Nashville road. I ascertained how many offices the Government supplied, and I took that as the average for the whole country. I found if the Government paid as much everywhere else as they paid there, we would pay nearly $2,000,000. But in reality we pay only $1,100,000. Therefore the rate is greater on that particular road than it is over the country at large. Taking that as a basis of calculation for the country offices, the railroads of the whole country would pay only $920,000.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator certainly did not take the basis of cost to the Government of those offices and then ascertain that it was only $46 per office.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It was $254.

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes; $254.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly; but the Government everywhere supplies the large offices. Taking out the eight great offices, and then figuring the cost for the 221 offices on that line, we have $46 an office.

Mr. FAULKNER. In the schedule sent to the Senate from the Post-Office Department of the amount paid on that particular road, were there over three offices that fell under $46?

Mr. PETTIGREW. No; there were not, I think. I am not sure about the exact figures. But a great number of offices were supplied by the postmasters themselves.

Mr. FAULKNER. Some of them, of course.

Mr. PETTIGREW. So, taking all that the Government supplied——

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator has guessed at $46.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not at all. It is borne out by the figures.

Mr. FAULKNER. The opinion of the Department is that the average costs in the country is $150 per post-office for this particular service.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is not hard to determine. That is their opinion. It is not borne out at all by any facts or figures they give us.

Mr. FAULKNER. The statement I made is borne out by the figures that would have been given to the Senator had he asked for them, but instead of getting this official information, he takes the figures of this particular road, and finding that it averages $254, then deducting certain offices and throwing off an estimate as to how many of these particular offices were supplied by the postmasters, the Senator reaches his conclusion of $46 per office.

Mr. PETTIGREW. No, Mr. President, not at all. If you will look at the evidence of the attorneys of this railroad, you will find the exact number of offices that the Government supplies and the exact number the road supplies.

Mr. FAULKNER. That is true, and——

Mr. PETTIGREW. So there is no guesswork on my part.

Mr. FAULKNER. There is no question of that, but you could not on that rely upon the conclusion of $46 per office by any calculation that could be made. The facts are as I have stated them, that on an average throughout the whole country it costs $150 per office.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FAULKNER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to say in this connection that in my opinion it does not cost a third of that sum and that the facts, when developed, will show it. All the data here figured out prove my statement.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Appropriations Committee is trying to get these facts under the very amendment which has been made to this bill, and it wants to get them before the Senate acts upon the question embodied in the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

In addition to this, at all the junction points, at transfer stations, and at all the stations in large cities, the common carriers are required to furnish for the benefit of the postal service and for the use of the transfer clerks large, well-lighted, well ventilated and heated rooms. If the Government was required to pay the cost of a fair rental, it would amount to a very large sum.

These considerations all enter into and become a part of the service rendered for the compensation paid to the roads. Additional obligations are put upon these companies. One is that at any time after 9 o'clock at night, or after the hour at which the post-office in any town is closed, it is the right of the superintendent of that division to authorize the mail to be delivered to the employees of the carrier, who are required to keep it safely, securely, and without any damage, under the penalties that are fixed by the fines that are provided, and to receive the mail from any trains coming in during the night, keep them securely, and to see that they are transferred into the hands of the Government at the proper hour.

Mr. President, there is another very important duty imposed upon the railways. The Post-Office Department has a right to require any mail train to stop at any station that the public interest requires such action on the part of the Department. This is a very valuable privilege in the interest of the public and one which meets with considerable antagonism from the road when the Department enforces it. One of the great questions of the day is how to meet the competition by the fastest trains between two given points; and yet the Post-Office Department has the right to step in and say, as they have frequently done within the last year, "We require that on this route the fast trains shall stop at a particular station," when they deem it to be to the public interest.

Mr. President, when fast trains are not required to stop at all the stations another requirement is imposed upon the company. It is to erect at its expense what are called mail catchers on both sides of the road at each station, so that the mail may be delivered in that way without the stopping of the train. That imposes a heavy expense. In a correspondence between a road and the Department upon this subject the carrier was seeking to avoid this duty by asserting that the order of the Department would cost it $20,000 for the erection of the mail catchers, the average cost of which was $15.

Mr. President, there is another very admirable provision which I approve in this law, and yet at times it works a very great hardship to the carrier. It is one which no other customer of any corporation would be permitted to exercise. It is that the mail weight upon which the rate of compensation is based is taken once in every four years. It is shown that the mail increases on an average of about 12 to 16 per cent a year throughout the whole country. In some sections it increases 24 per cent, in others 20 per cent. In others it runs down as low as 11 and 12 per cent. Yet the weight of the mail as weighed, for example, in 1892 is the basis of the compensation for four years, regardless of this annual increase. Take, for example, the illustration given in the testimony of the development of Oklahoma Territory. Two hundred thousand people rushed into that Territory, and yet the weighing having occurred prior to its occupation and when its population was small and insignificant, under the law the road was compelled to carry the mail for the increased population for two years without any additional compensation.

The only statement that is accurately given by any road is that furnished by Mr. Knott, of the Louisville and Nashville. He shows that under the regulation requiring the weighing of the mail once in four years there was lost to the company under the rates provided by law $103,829.40. But I fully approve of that statute. The weighing can not take place every year, and it ought not to be done; the roads must take the risk of the increase of the mail. I believe there are only two or three instances in which the weight of the mail has ever been decreased.

These illustrations will show some of the differences between the right and power of the Government in the carrying of mail and that of any private customers of common carriers.

The Senator from South Dakota, in seeking to overthrow the views of the Department in reference to its comparison between passenger rates and mail rates, ridiculed the idea that any comparison could be made upon the basis of the income received from a passenger coach and a postal car. There are several ways in which it is worked out in the testimony. In one case, as stated by the Postmaster-General, they ascertained that on the Pennsylvania Railroad the average number of passengers was thirty, which would yield 58½ cents per mile, compared with a postal car which yields but 13.6 cents. The average of passengers to a car on the New York Central is but twenty, which would yield 38 cents, against 13.6 for a postal car. This method is not novel; it is the usual and constant method adopted to ascertain such results and in making comparisons of profit and loss.

Mr. Knott adopted another method. The passenger-train traffic, as a whole, was included—the baggage, postal, passenger, and the Pullman cars. The calculation as to the cost was then ascertained for each service by taking the car mileage, the aggregate cost, and assigning to each service the cost based on the space occupied by each, he reaching the same conclusion as the Department, that the net earning, not including interest and taxes, of carrying the mail was 4.96 cents, and the net earning in carrying passengers was 6.23 cents; 20 per cent in favor of passenger traffic.

Mr. Knott then checks this comparison, and in his statement explains his method by saying:

> For the purpose of checking this comparison I have caused to be compiled a statement of the gross weight hauled 1 mile in passenger cars and in mail cars. By "gross weight" I mean not only the total paying weight, but the weight of the cars in which the passengers and mails were respectively transported, charging the passenger transportation with the weight of the baggage cars and the baggage therein. And from this it is ascertained that for the year ended June 30, 1897, the earnings per ton per mile for "paying" and "dead" weight hauled in passenger trains were:
> | | Cent. |
> |---|---|
> | Mail | .6101 |

The expenses per ton per mile, again using the same gross weight, were:

	Cent.
Passengers	0.4735
Mail	.4722

Leaving net earnings, not including interest and taxes:

	Cent.
Passengers, per gross ton carried	0.2129
Mail, per gross ton carried	.1379

A difference of over 50 per cent in favor of the passenger account.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] presents a table which shows a reduction in passenger rates during the last fifteen years. It is general, including the whole country. I admit that, taking all the roads, there is a slight reduction in passenger rates during the last fifteen years, but this is not true as to the leading and best-equipped roads, as he will learn by an examination of their reports. Where the service of the passenger traffic has been much improved, both as to speed and other elements entering into the service rendered, the cost of that service has in fact increased. One of the best illustrations that I can give is cost of passenger service on the Pennsylvania road, which I think is the model road of the country. In 1876 the cost was $1.05; in 1886, it was $1.46; in 1888, it was $1.54; in 1897, it was $1.54. That is taken from the report of the Pennsylvania Railroad, as I understand, and is found in the testimony of Mr. Knott, who was before the committee and represented the Louisville and Nashville Railroad.

The conclusion reached by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, after he had examined this subject from every standpoint, was as follows:

Estimating the weight of a passenger at 150 pounds, as we do, the revenue railroads receive from the passenger traffic averages eight-tenths of a cent per 100 pounds per mile on the leading lines of the country, as compared with a little less than one-third of a cent per 100 pounds that they receive from the mail pay.

Mr. President, there is nothing in this record which conflicts with the conclusions reached by this official of the Department. We must therefore accept it as true. In comparing the mail service with express transportation and the relative cost of the two, we must look at some further differences between the two services rendered to determine their relative cost. The mail rate is a compensation depending upon weight and fixed by law, and on routes where postal cars are used additional compensation is paid, also regulated by statute. The express-company service depends upon contract, as does the amount of the payments. Its contracts require it to pay to all railroads not less than 40 per cent of its gross receipts. The evidence before the committee was that on some roads it paid 50 per cent of its gross receipts. But in addition to the contract to pay 40 or 50 per cent of its gross receipts, there is a further provision in which it guarantees a fixed compensation, which is generally the sum which from the business of the last year would be equal the amount received on the percentage of gross receipts.

Under this guarantee the express company takes all the risk of the loss of business during the year under the contracts that it makes with the common carriers. This is clear. The amount is fixed, and if it does not reach the per cent of gross receipts equal to the amount fixed its obligation is not changed. The express company takes all the risk of business prostration, the carrier none.

The contract of the express company, in addition to providing for the paying this percentage of gross receipts or the fixed sum agreed upon for the annual compensation, further agrees to pay, on most of the roads, 50 per cent of the wages of the men who jointly handle the baggage and the express matter in the compartment cars; and in addition to paying those employees of the railroad, they agree to pay a commission to the agents at the different stations, which enables the carrier, as is stated in the evidence, to reduce the amount of the aggregate pay of their employees almost to the extent of the sum that is paid by the express company. As to how much that is in the United States we have no evidence. One road informed us that it amounted annually to $110,000 in saving of wages, which it would otherwise have paid. Another stated that it amounted to over $53,000. Figures were given as to other roads, but the aggregate paid in the country was not ascertained.

Mr. President, in addition to these suggestions, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to a fact which certainly must have made an impression upon his mind. It certainly did upon mine. The express company agrees in all their contracts with the roads to carry its funds and all express business of the carrier between all stations on its line.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In view of the fact that the Senator calls my special attention to this point, I should like to call his attention to the fact that the only people in this country who are allowed to carry first-class mail outside of the Government are the railroad companies. They are allowed to carry their own mail as a part of the consideration, and that offsets the proposition just made in regard to the express company.

Mr. FAULKNER. I believe the Senator from South Dakota is a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PETTIGREW. No; I am not on that committee.

Mr. FAULKNER. I thought the Senator was. I concur with him to some extent. Some time ago I had information, incidentally, of what happened in my own town. There was an order from the Post-Office Department received by the agents of the companies at that place prohibiting the roads from carrying letters upon the railroad trains. That regulation, I think, is still in force.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The facts are about as I shall state. The railroads were allowed to carry their own mail. Then they began to carry it for each other. Then they began to carry it for individuals, because there was such an enormous profit upon first-class mail, the pay being ninety cents and a dollar a pound. The abuse became so great that they were defrauding the Government out of very large sums of money. So the Department called attention to the Revised Statutes, which make this a criminal offense. All this appeared in the debate a year ago. I called the attention of the Senate and of the country to this fact then.

Mr. FAULKNER. That has been remedied, I understand.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have never known of it.

Mr. GEAR. I will state that railroads are permitted to carry only their own mail, relating to their own business, marked "R. R. B."

Mr. FAULKNER. That is what I understood to have been the order issued some years ago, and I have never heard of its having been changed or modified by the Department.

Mr. President, you must see at once the immense responsibility as well as liability assumed by the express company in agreeing to carry all the funds of a great railroad system 7,000 miles in length from any station to the main office. The money value of that service to the carrier I can not state. It certainly must run up into the millions.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have seen on a great many roads a pay car which traveled and paid all the help.

Mr. FAULKNER. Ah, that is not what I alluded to. That is what is known as a pay car, that goes out from the main office for the purpose of disbursing the wages of the employees of the company. The money that I referred to as carried by the express company is collected at every station from the agents of the road and others and taken by the express company to the main office.

Mr. GEAR. I will state to the Senator from West Virginia that the station agents are required by all the railroads to make daily reports and send in their money.

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course they are, and they send it through the express company, and the express company is liable to the railroad company for every dollar that is lost by reason of negligence or the criminal acts of their agents. It is a very large compensation paid by the express company in addition to 40 or 50 per cent on its gross receipts in consideration of the service rendered by the carrier. In this connection there is another very important matter that the Senate should know. Under the provisions of these express contracts, the company releases the carrier from all liability, not only for injury to the employees of the express company, but for all loss or damage caused to express goods.

Just think of it, Mr. President. The express, to obtain the service rendered by the carrier, is compelled to carry all the money and the express matter of the roads, then to agree to release the carrier from all liability for injury to its employees, though the company may have been guilty of negligence; in other words, sir, they become an insurer to the carrier against any loss or damage by reason of the negligence of the company, both as to its employees and to the goods it transports. Can this service be compared with the mail service? Mr. President, the carrier investment in the building and use of postal and express cars is very different. The roads are required to build postal cars according to specifications furnished by the Department, and every car that is built by one of these companies for the purpose of carrying the mails is required to pass the inspection of Department officials.

The Senator gave a table of the cost of mail, baggage, and express cars, claiming that the postal car cost but $2,300. This table refers only to passenger, mail, and baggage cars; it does not in terms include postal cars. When it embraces "mail and baggage cars," it must refer to what are known as compartment cars that carry both mail, baggage, and express. The cost of construction given excludes the inference that the table of cost included postal cars.

Mr. President, if there had been any doubt as to their cost, it could have been easily removed by the Senator. If he believed that the statements as to cost were false, why did he not inform the members of the subcommittee of that belief and ask that the fact be investigated, that the committee and the Senate should have the information on which to determine the truth or falsehood of the statements submitted?

Could there have been any difficulty in ascertaining what is the cost of the construction of a postal railway car? Did not the Department officials inform us that their cost was about $6,000? Mr. Knott fixed the average cost at $5,250. There is not one word in the record before the committee which disputes those statements; and yet the Senator presents a table with a general average of cost of passenger, mail, baggage, and express cars of a railroad in the East, fixing the cost of those cars at $2,300, claiming that it embraces postal cars, and that therefore the statements in the record are false.

The only official who has ever estimated the cost of these cars at a lower price was Secretary Vilas, who fixed it at $4,500 or $4,300.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, then one Postmaster-General says $4,500 and another one says $3,000——

Mr. FAULKNER. At that time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. And I furnish the railway report of New York State for 1896, under the head of "cost of cars," and they give first-class passenger, second-class passenger, then baggage, mail, and express cars, and then box cars, covering the entire report of every car; and under the head of "mail, baggage, and express" that class of cars is placed.

Mr. FAULKNER. The postal railway cars are the best constructed cars with the exception of the Pullman cars that are run on passenger trains; their weight is over 44 tons. The cars are furnished with vestibules. They have attached to them also every modern appliance for safety which is known to science. They are furnished with all the conveniences for the distribution of the mail, for taking care of the clothing of the postal clerks; are supplied with the very best light which science has furnished for the illumination of any car used in the United States. I am satisfied that it will appear upon investigation that the specifications for these cars have been improved since the period when Senator Vilas made a thorough examination of this subject, and that it will be shown that the cost of construction has been increased.

Mr. President, these cars, while not owned by the Government, are exclusively controlled by it. An ordinary express car or a compartment car can be used by the carrier as its business may demand, but the postal car can only be used by the Government. Therefore such cars are exclusively within the control of the Department, which makes a vast difference to the road.

Again, express traffic is frequently carried at night and on fewer trains than the mail. Take, as an illustration, the lines between New York and Philadelphia. We pay a fixed compensation for 309,000 pounds of mail a day between these two cities. That is the average weight of mail per day between those points. That weight of mail is carried on those roads by 100 trains in order to meet the demands of the service, including the local service along the routes, whereas the express business can be accommodated, I have no doubt, by the transportation of its business on one-tenth of that number of trains.

Mr. President, permit me to call the Senate's attention to a statement made by Mr. Baldwin, of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, comparing the cost of the services rendered to the Government and to the express company. He says in his statement before the committee, on page 8:

> For instance, in a paper presented as Senate Document No. 217 is quoted a special rate given by an express company last fall to a local medical association, at Louisville, of 1 cent per pound, to enable the members to distribute their proceedings and papers.
> Being local in character, it is highly improbable that this rate was used for distances greater than 100 miles on an average, for which distance 1 cent a pound, being $20 a ton, would be 20 cents per ton per mile, which is more than three times the rate paid by the Government for transporting the mails on any railroad carrying over 5,000 pounds per day.

Then he illustrates the difference in cost. Further on he says:

> This paper also quotes a rate of the Adams Express Company, New York to Boston—232 miles—of 1 cent a pound in packages of 75 pounds and upward.
> This is business highly competitive with numerous railroad and water routes and other express lines. It is a wholesale rate, being restricted to 75-pound packages. At 1 cent a pound, or $20 per ton, it is 9 cents per ton per mile, or 50 per cent higher, pound for pound, than the Government is paying to the New York and New Haven Railroad for transporting mails over the same route. These mails contain not simply the heavy and comparatively cheap and low-grade articles which the express company carries in 75-pound packages, but letters, bonds, and numberless documents of value—the correspondence of the people.

He gives a very good and practical illustration to show the difference in cost between the mail and express when the value of the packages is taken into consideration. He says:

> A Washington gentleman recently sought to send some bonds by express from here to New York. The express company asked him $4.70; he sent them by registered mail for 10 cents.

The difference between the service rendered to the public is found in that illustration. On real freight matter their rates are comparatively reasonable, but very high on valuable packages. However, in relation to the post-office service it is entirely different. Distance is not considered; the character of the contents does not affect the cost. If it is first-class mail matter, the contents in the envelope may not be worth the one-thousandth part of a cent or it may be worth $10,000, and yet it depends entirely upon the weight as to what it will cost the citizen to send it through the mails of the United States to any point in our jurisdiction. There is one fixed price per ounce in the carriage of the mail, and that is paid, regardless of the value of the particular article which is conveyed. The express carries no package for less than 25 cents, even though it be but a mile haul, which transportation out of many of our cities would give them a rate equivalent to $500 per ton per mile. In fact, there is no comparison between the two systems of transportation nor of their cost.

I desire to submit the statement of the auditor of the Atchison system, in which he draws this conclusion from the details which he had submitted to the committee:

> It will be seen from the above that while we received for the year treated of $49,686.39 less from the express company than from the Government, it cost us for the service rendered the express company $177,480.66 less than for that rendered the Government—this on the actual money basis alone, without regard to the many outside considerations which have been pointed out in connection with this subject, as well as the subject of mail pay.

Mr. President, these are practical illustrations drawn from the actual cost of the two services on a given system.

The letter from the general manager of the express company, whose business was carried over the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, is well worthy of the consideration of the Senate. It is a letter written in 1894, which excludes an inference that it was suggested by this investigation or was prepared with a view to influence legislation; and yet an examination of that letter, addressed to the New York Central Railroad, in which he is complaining of the inferior service given the express company compared with that given the mail, and to the greater cost to the express company in the transportation of its business, would, it seems to me, satisfy a "doubting Thomas" that the Government was not being robbed.

He asserts that there ought to be a difference in cost of from 25 to 40 per cent between the services; and he demands of that company, in consideration of the facts which he states in this letter, that he shall at once give to the company better facilities in consideration of the compensation it is paying. It appears that Mr. Weir, the president of the Adams Express Company, happened to hear of the complaint which had been made, and wrote to inquire what the character of the statement was which it contained. He mentioned it before the committee, and at our request and with the consent of the company he subsequently obtained a copy of the letter and filed it as part of the record here.

Mr. President, it is impossible for me to bring to the attention of the Senate all the facts brought out by this investigation. I desire to refer to another branch discussed by the Senator, and then I shall yield the floor.

The Senator from South Dakota has inserted in the RECORD a long table showing the reductions in the cost of carrying freight. We are all aware that freight rates in this country, in the aggregate, have been largely reduced, owing to two causes. One has been the greater hauling power secured in the construction of the engines which are manufactured to-day, and the other is the result of the enlargement of the size of the cars for transportation and their greater carrying capacity; therefore on all bulky or heavy articles, such as coal, iron ore, steel billets, and freight of that character, the reduction in the last ten or fifteen years has been very great; but I challenge the Senator from South Dakota to show to the Senate that during that period the cost of transportation on first-class freight has been reduced to any considerable extent. The Senator would certainly not ask that a cost of the carriage of a low class of freight should be compared with the cost of our unsurpassed mail service.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have published in the RECORD an official letter from the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which they show a steady decline, taking all freights together.

Mr. FAULKNER. Oh, yes; that is true. But the Senator has not answered the question which I submitted to him. You can not compare the carrying of the United States mail, when you consider the rapidity required in the service, with the character of cars and train service required for the transportation of coal or iron ore or steel billets and pig iron.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RAWLINS in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, no one has undertaken to make such a comparison, unless it be the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who will indulge in almost anything. The fact of the matter is that I simply showed that there was a decline in the cost of carrying freight, and that there was a general decline in the cost of doing the railway service, and that therefore there ought to be a decline in the cost to the Government of carrying the mail.

Mr. FAULKNER. The reasons of the decline in certain classes of freight were fully presented to the committee, and those statements are uncontradicted. They show that the cost on first-class freight has not decreased, but in many instances has increased. The cause of the increase has resulted from a demand for a higher grade of service in the carriage of first-class and fast freight.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In this connection, I will say that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company carries first-class freight from New Orleans to San Francisco, 1,500 miles, for eight-tenths of a cent per pound. I do not know how much they charged a few years ago, but they went into court and fought a case for the privilege of carrying at eight-tenths of a cent a pound, other carriers complaining.

Mr. FAULKNER. That must be cheaper than most of the railroads carry freight, especially in the West.

Mr. PETTIGREW. But according to the figures of the railroad companies themselves, they pay 4½ cents a pound for carrying the mails between New York and Chicago.

Mr. FAULKNER. What distance?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Between New York and Chicago, 900 miles.

Mr. FAULKNER. No, sir; the cost is for 328 miles 5.27 cents, less than 6 mills a mile.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I see that Mr. Huntington testified before the California commission a day or two since that Southern Pacific Railroad stock was worth about 12 cents and that it never had yet paid a dividend. So that company may be carrying freight for less than it costs.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Oh, Mr. President, it ought not to be worth 12 cents, for it was issued without any possible consideration, and they have bonded the road for more than it cost, so they have made a profit, and hence the enormous fortunes of Huntington and those railroad magnates. There is nothing in that, Mr. President. The evidence shows that we paid $4.33 a hundred for carrying the mails from New York to Chicago, and Huntington carries first-class freight from New Orleans to San Francisco for eight-tenths of a cent a pound, or 80 cents a hundred, a distance of 1,500 miles.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not know how that may be. I suppose the Senator has examined into it; I have not. I am trying to confine my discussion to the facts disclosed in the record, because it is upon those facts that I must act.

Mr. Knott in his statement gives the rate from New York to Chicago, as follows:

Year.	Class 1.	Class 2.	Class 3.
1892	75	65	50

Showing an increase on second and third class between 1882 and 1892. From Missouri River points, Kansas City, Atchison, Leavenworth, St. Joseph, etc., he gives the following statement:

From—	Class 1.		Class 2.		Class 3.
	1882.	1892.	1882.	1892.	1882.	1892.
Chicago	90	75	75	60	50	42
St. Louis	70	55	55	40	40	32

This shows the reduction in the three classes of freights referred to.

In Southern territory the rates from the principal Western points distributing into the South, taking the rates to Atlanta as a representative point, have been reduced from time to time, as shown by the following comparative figures:

Rates per 100 pounds.

From—	Class 1.		Class 2.		Class 3.

Louisville	1.18	1.07	1.02	.92	.88	.81
Cincinnati	1.18	1.07	1.02	.92	.88	.81

The transcontinental rates—that is, the rates to San Francisco and other principal Pacific coast points, on the higher grades—may be compared as follows:

Rates per 100 pounds.

I will ask leave to insert in my remarks the statement of Mr. Knott on page 72 of the hearings before the committee in relation to the Eastern railroads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the rates charged on the short roads and compare the mail rates with the freight rates on those roads. On page 66 of the hearing Mr. Knott says:

This average rate of 11.3 cents per ton per mile represents a little over one-half a cent per 100 pounds per mile, or for an average distance of 10 miles 5.6 cents per 100 pounds.

That is the mail rate. Now, compare this with the cost of freight on similar roads:

	Cents.
Class 1	12
Class 2	10
Class 3	9
Class 4	8
Class 5	7
Class 6	6

Mr. President, you will observe that even on the sixth-class freight the rates are higher than the mail rates on those roads. You will find that under the authority of the commission which controls the question of freights.

The Illinois railroad and warehouse commission has established, by the authority vested in it, what it deems reasonable maximum charges for the transportation of freights between points in the State of Illinois, and that tariff authorizes railroads in that State to charge for freights 10 miles and under 6 miles, in cents per 100 pounds:

	Cents.
Class 1	15
Class 2	13
Class 3	11
Class 4	8
Class 5	6

In Georgia we find the same if not a greater difference in favor of the mail rate. The railroad commission of that State has fixed the rates on similar roads. There the rates are as follows:

	Cents.
Class 1	16
Class 2	14
Class 3	13
Class 4	10
Class 5	9
Class 6	8

Upon a practical test Mr. Knott shows that instead of receiving 12, 15, or 16 cents per 100 pounds, the Government on the same roads only pays for its mail 5.6 cents per 100 pounds. As I have more confidence and rely more upon the opinion of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General than my friend from South Dakota,

I desire to read his conclusions on this subject, to be found on page 121 of the testimony:

Senator CULLOM. From your study of this question since you came into office and from your study of the charges on express lines, and of the cost of transportation of passengers and of mails on fast trains, state to the committee whether or not your conclusion is that the companies are not receiving for the transportation of the mails greater compensation than they ought to receive. Is that your conclusion?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That, in the presence of this committee, would be my conclusion, very clearly stated. I have not so stated it to any one of the companies; but, in the presence of this committee, I can state emphatically that I have been surprised to find that the rates allowed under the operation of the present law were less, proportionately, in my judgment, considering cost of service, than the rates of compensation allowed them by express companies or passenger traffic, and in some instances by high-class freight. I affirm that we are getting mail carried in some instances lower than the high-class freight on the same line.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota, in considering the cost of the mail service, assumes that it is fair and just to consider it upon a principle of a general average embracing the whole country. It is not an intelligent way to present it to the Senate. Here is a statement made by Mr. Baldwin before the committee which no one has challenged and which throws more light upon the question than any statement which I have heard or read. He shows on pages 10 and 11 of the record that the routes carrying over 5,000 pounds of mail a day carry nine-tenths of the mail of the United States, and though carrying nine-tenths of the entire mail, the roads received a compensation of only $22,641,000 out of an appropriation of $33,876,000.

In other words, if these roads were paid by the average rate paid in the country, they would have received, instead of $22,641,000, over $30,000,000, but being roads that carried over 5,000 pounds a day, their compensation decreased as the weight of mail increased, and it was found that under the automatic working of the law they had to take, instead of $30,000,000, $22,641,000; the $8,000,000 they failed to receive was transferred to the smaller roads, on which the question is not one of weight, but really of messenger service. Take the case given by Mr. Baldwin, from my own State, to illustrate how the general average of cost of the country is raised by the small roads:

In West Virginia there is a route 14 miles long, from Coalburg to Acme, which carries 55 pounds of mail daily, its yearly compensation being $606. But it only carries about 10 tons a year.

It is true the road carries 20,000 pounds of mail a year. What is the cost of carrying the mail a year to the Government on that route? Sixty dollars a ton. What is it a mile? Four dollars and twenty-eight cents, while on the larger roads it is carried for less than a cent a mile. These small roads are the ones that raise the general average.

Mr. President, I will close my remarks by calling the attention of the Senate to the tables found on pages 126 and 127. When the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was before the subcommittee he presented a table of twenty roads, in which he gave the transportation pay, the average daily weight, the pounds per annum, cost per ton per mile, and the average number of round trips per week on the twenty roads, which in his judgment covered pretty well the country and fairly illustrated the increase of the service and the decrease of the cost.

But after an examination by the subcommittee he was informed that we thought it better to have more roads to illustrate his view, including some of the smaller roads, and to cover in the statement more fully the Western section of the country. We requested him to add to the table twenty more roads. The facts contained in the tables on pages 126 and 127 are not the result of speculation, of surmises, or of mere opinion. They are actual results taken from the books of the Department, and every one of the figures contained in it can be verified by any Senator who doubts their accuracy. In considering the results shown by these tables, we are confronted by established facts and not the speculations and opinions of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. Having examined them carefully, I called upon him and requested that he should furnish me tables which would aggregate the results and show by average percentage the conditions of the postal business. He promptly consented to have such tables prepared. I will now proceed to present the conclusions reached by the Department from the figures found in these tables.

The comparison is to show the cost of mail service from 1879 to 1897, and he takes the two weighing periods of 1879 and 1882 and 1894 and 1897. I will not read all the figures, but will include the tables in my remarks. He first takes the table of roads which he first submitted. He finds that the transportation pay of those twenty roads increased during that period, from 1882 to 1897, 123 per cent. He finds the average daily weight of mail upon those twenty roads increased 209 per cent, almost 100 per cent beyond the increase of the compensation resulting from increased weight that reduced the rate. The pounds per annum increased 209 per cent, the cost per ton per mile decreased 51.6 per cent, and the average number of trips per week increased during that period 115 per cent.

On those twenty roads the increase of the service was 115 per cent; the increase of the mail was 209 per cent, while the transportation pay was decreased to the extent of 51.6 per cent per ton per mile. Few business interests in this country, passing through a period of depression and panic, could exhibit such results.

Let us refer to the results shown by the second table of twenty roads, some of which receive $1.04 per ton per mile, which is a very high rate, mere messenger routes, and we find that the increased pay from 1879 to 1897 for transportation was 92 per cent, the increased weight was 268 per cent—more than 250 per cent increase of mail carried over the increase of pay received—and the cost per ton per mile decreased 46 per cent, while the increase in improvement of the service was 72 per cent.

The third table ascertains the average results, taking the forty roads, and ascertains that the transportation pay on the forty roads increased 114 per cent, the average weight of mail carried increased 222 per cent, the average service improved 98 per cent, and yet on the forty roads which he says are a fair illustration of mail transportation for the whole country it decreased per ton per mile 49 per cent. The pay or compensation decreased per ton per mile 49 per cent. And yet the Senators from South Dakota and from North Carolina insist the cost of the mail service has not been reduced since 1878. These tables prove their error and demonstrate that the law in its automatic working is guarding the interest of the Government.

Referring to page 126 of the "Statements," etc., accompanying Senate Report No. 991, where data respecting twenty routes is shown, and by grouping together the items relating to the routes for the period 1879 to 1882 and averaging the respective totals, and comparing those averages with the averages obtained in a like manner for the same routes for the period 1894 to 1897, we have the following results, showing per cent of increase and decrease in the latter period as compared with the former, viz:

	Transportation pay.	Average daily weight.	Pounds per annum.	Cost per ton per mile.	Average number of round trips per week.
Average per route for—		Pounds.		Cents.
First period	$96,886.23	17,475	6,378,375	0.546	20.12
Second period	194,422.57	54,033	19,722,227	.264	43.26
Increase, per cent	123	209	209		115
Decrease, per cent				51.6

By making a like comparison between the averages obtained in a similar manner for the twenty routes shown on page 127 for the period 1879 to 1887, and the same routes for the period 1894 to 1897, we have the following results, showing the per cent of increase and decrease in the latter period as compared with the former, viz:

	Transportation pay.	Average daily weight.	Pounds per annum.	Cost per ton per mile.	Average number of round trips per week.
Average per route for—		Pounds.		Cents.
First period	$37,511.50	5,297	1,933,405	0.409	12.41
Second period	72,051.20	19,509	7,120,912	.221	21.45
Increase, per cent	92	268	268		72
Decrease, per cent				46

By making a like comparison between the averages obtained in a similar manner for the forty routes shown on both pages 126 and 127 during the period 1879 to 1887, and the same routes for the period 1894 to 1897, we have the following results, showing the per cent of increase and decrease in the latter period as compared with the former, viz:

	Transportation pay.	Average daily weight.	Pounds per annum.	Cost per ton per mile.	Average number of round trips per week.
Average per route for—		Pounds.		Cents.
First period	$62,198.87	11,386	4,155,890	0.477	16.27
Second period	133,236.88	36,771	13,421,570	.242	32.35

Mr. President, with these facts before the committee, I ask Senators, in all candor and fairness, Could the Committee on Appropriations arbitrarily and against this array of facts reduce the compensation of the railroad mail service, especially by adopting the amendment of the Senator making a horizontal reduction from present rates, and without any information as to the effect on particular lines? To have done so with the facts before the committee would have been a crime against the people. Sir, we do not stand here opposing an investigation of this subject. We believe that the most exhaustive investigation should be made, one that will satisfy not only the doubting mind of the Senator from South Dakota but the public. We further believe that the public sentiment demands such an inquiry, and that when once made it will either cause a reduction in the cost of mail transportation, or it will remove the impression and belief of many that the rate is too high. We have therefore amended the bill by creating a commission to discharge this duty. We were not willing to leave it to a regular committee.

They are so burdened with the ordinary business of the Senate that it was believed to be impossible for them to devote the time to this investigation which the importance of the subject demanded. The committee therefore determined to recommend the creation of a commission, that the whole question could be calmly, deliberately, and exhaustively examined. Did the Committee on Appropriations act wisely and properly in their recommendation that this amendment should be adopted and that the compensation of the roads should not be interfered with until its report should be presented and all the considerations which should control the subject should be before us? The amendment requires a report at the next session of Congress, when the whole subject will be brought up for consideration in this body and that of the other House. Then, with all the information that can be given Congress by the Department, with the evidence then in the possession of the Senate, official and otherwise, we will be enabled to do that which will prove just to the Government and the people, fair to those great interests affected, and at the same time preserve the efficiency and promote the development of our unequaled mail service.

I hope this amendment of the Senator from South Dakota will be rejected.

Mr. BUTLER obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for two or three minutes? I desire to call up the joint resolution of the House of Representatives which has just come over, in relation to a vote of thanks to Commodore Dewey, and ask the Senate to pass it, so that it may become a law.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

COMMODORE GEORGE DEWEY.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the joint resolution in relation to Commodore Dewey.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 260) tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore George Dewey, United States Navy, and to the officers and men of the squadron under his command, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That, in pursuance of the recommendation of the President, made in accordance with the provisions of section 1508 of the Revised Statutes, the thanks of Congress and of the American people are hereby tendered to Commodore George Dewey, United States Navy, commander in chief of the United States naval force on the Asiatic station, for highly distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy, as displayed by him in the destruction of the Spanish fleet and batteries in the harbor of Manila, Philippine Islands, May 1, 1898.

SEC. 2. That the thanks of Congress and the American people are hereby extended through Commodore Dewey to the officers and men under his command for the gallantry and skill exhibited by them on that occasion.

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States be requested to cause this resolution to be communicated to Commodore Dewey and, through him, to the officers and men under his command.

Mr. HALE. That is identical with the joint resolution passed this morning by the Senate, and I ask that it may be put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REAR-ADMIRALS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the bill from the House fixing the number of rear-admirals in the Navy.

The bill (H. R. 10251) fixing the number of rear-admirals in the United States Navy was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the number of rear-admirals in the United States Navy now allowed by law be, and is hereby, increased from six to seven, and this act shall be construed and taken as validating and making in force and effect any promotion to said rank of rear-admiral in the United States Navy made heretofore or hereafter and during the existing war and based upon the thanks of Congress.

Mr. HALE. That is precisely similar to the bill passed by the Senate, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 439) granting an increase of pension to Hannah Letcher Stevenson;

A bill (S. 496) granting a pension to Simpson Everett Stilwell;

A bill (S. 637) granting an increase of pension to Oliver P. Silvey;

A bill (S. 732) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Wright;

A bill (S. 1476) granting an increase of pension to Louise M. Rice;

A bill (S. 1829) granting an increase of pension to James H. Kile;

A bill (S. 4452) authorizing the Campbell-Lynch Company to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Webbers Falls, Ind. T.; and

A bill (H. R. 5975) extending the homestead laws and providing for right of way for railroads in the District of Alaska, and for other purposes.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9008) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Paesident, I offered and sent to the Committee on Appropriations an amendment proposing a reduction of 20 per cent of the rates paid railroads for carrying the mails. It seems that it has caused the laborious effort of the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Pennsylvania put forth to prevent such a reduction. I send the amendment to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

On page 8, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "thirty million five hundred thousand dollars," and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-four million four hundred thousand dollars; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1898, for the transportation of mails on railway routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails at least 20 per cent per annum from the rate fixed in section 4002 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by act of July 12, 1876, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes,' and as further amended by act of June 17, 1878, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes,' for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight; and the above amount appropriated shall cover full compensation for railway mail transportation."

Mr. BUTLER. This amendment is in the exact form of two other amendments which in the past have been acted upon, reducing the transportation paid to railways. In 1876 there was an amendment in this form put on an appropriation bill, reducing the pay of the railroads 10 per cent. Again, in 1878, there was a similar amendment adopted providing for a reduction of 5 per cent. It is twenty years since the last one of these amendments readjusting railway-mail pay was acted upon by Congress.

It seemed to me that the time had come certainly after twenty years to readjust the matter again. During this time the price of everything but gold and the price we pay railroads for carrying the mails has been reduced about 40 per cent. Therefore I drew an amendment in the same form as the former amendments, providing for a readjustment of rates. It seems to me clear that the rates should be reduced 40 per cent, which would be a saving of $12,000,000 a year; but my amendment provides for a reduction of only half that amount. I have limited the reduction to 20 per cent because it is proposed to investigate this matter by special committee before the next Congress must deal with it.

Mr. President, am I justified in contending that there should be such a reduction? Let us see. We have had the reports of the Postmasters-General from 1885 right on down almost without exception to the present time, calling attention to the fact that the pay to railroads for carrying the mail was increasing, that it was one of the great items of expense, and that under the law it was increasing more rapidly than it ought to increase.

What reason have I to think that the pay needs revising and reducing? I call attention to the fact that the various Postmasters-General, none of whom have ever been accused of being hostile to railroads, none of whom have ever been accused of being too anxious to investigate and scrutinize the charges paid the railroads, have called the attention of Congress to the pay, time after time, beginning with 1885. I have in my hand one of the annual reports of Postmaster-General Vilas. On page 249 he calls attention to how fast the pay for the railways is increasing and the necessity for changing the law. The following is a part of what he says:

The subject of compensation of railroads for the transportation of the mails has for many years attracted the attention of Congress, as is evidenced by the debates in that body and the commissions which have from time to time been appointed for the purpose of investigating and reporting upon that subject. This is the most interesting and important branch of the postal service. Its rapid growth, vast extent, and superior character have elicited the just commendation of all who are familiar with it. Its increasing aggregate cost, however, has been the subject of frequent comment and some criticism.

The method of basing the compensation upon the weight of the mails carried has met with serious objection as furnishing an unsafe and unreliable criterion of the value of the service rendered, and plans have from time to time been suggested which, it was thought by those who proposed them, would dispense with this method of adjusting the compensation of railroad transportation, and which, while giving to the railroads a fair and reasonable remuneration for the important service which they render to the country in the transportation of the mails, would considerably reduce the cost of such service to the Government. None of these plans have as yet received the approbation of Congress. * * *

Now, notice how the rate of pay per mile has increased each year. I read from the same report:

The following table shows the average rate of cost per mile per annum, based on the length of the routes, for railroad transportation:

Years.	Length.	Pay for transportation.	Rate per mile.
	Miles.
1880	85,320	$9,237,945	$108.27
1881	91,569	10,249,261	111.93
1882	100,563	11,297,338	112.34
1883	110,208	12,288,799	111.50
1884	117,160	13,273,000	113.29
1885	121,082	14,758,495	121.95

I have figured up the matter in 1897, and I find that the table continued would show for 1897 as follows:

Length of routes	miles..	173,475
Pay for transportation		$30,171,542.69
Rate per mile		$173.90

Notice that the rate per mile has increased from $108.27 in 1880 to $173.90 per mile in 1897. As the Postmaster-General says, this is an unreasonable increase.

I will read the closing sentence on page 250, where the Postmaster-General says:

What is eminently to be desired is that some method of compensation be found and adopted which, while it will not reduce the character and efficiency of the service, will reduce the ratio of increase in cost.

In his next report for 1886 and 1887 he follows the same line of recommendation to Congress. On page 42 of his report of 1887 he says:

The star and steamboat service is much more within the discretionary government of the Department than the railroad carriage, and the advantage of this will be apparent on examining the gains accomplished in the reduction of cost, while at the same time more extensive and more efficient service has been secured.

Thus we see that we have each year gotten "more extensive and more efficient service" from the steamboat and star-route service at a reduced cost, while on the other hand the cost of railroad service has increased enormously and out of all reason.

Mr. President, I have figured this matter out for the star-route and railroad service for each year from 1885 down to and including 1897. Let us first look at the star-route service:

Star-route service.

Year.	Length of route.	Total pay for transportation.	Average per mile.
	Miles.
1885	232,222	$5,414,804.00	$23.31
1886	233,915	5,352,181.00	22.88
1891	237,845	5,376,861.35	22.60
1892	243,722	5,520,420.85	22.65
1893	249,859	5,680,572.36	22.73
1894	251,587	5,846,855.65	23.23
1895	257,663	5,753,579.07	22.32
1896	262,575	5,836,221.38	22.22
1897	265,598	5,363,903.41	20.19

Notice that in 1885 there were 232,222 miles of star routes; in 1897 the routes had increased to 265,598 miles—an increase of 33,376 miles. Now, how much did the cost of the star-route service increase? None; there was a decrease in cost to the Government.

Notice that in 1885 the total pay for star-route mail service was $5,414,804, while in 1897 the cost was only $5,363,903.41, which is a saving of $50,900.59.

That is, we had 33,376 more miles of star-route service in 1897, yet it cost the Government $50,900.59 less.

To state it another way, in 1885 the cost for each mile of star route was $23.31; while in 1897 the cost for each mile of route was $20.19, a saving of $3.12 a mile.

As the Postmaster-General says, we have gotten a "more extensive and more efficient service" at "a reduction of cost."

This is a fine showing for efficiency and economy. But when we turn to the railroad mail service, how is it?

We find that the pay per mile has not decreased, but has greatly increased. If there had been the same economy in the railway mail pay per mile as there has been in the star-route service, we would to-day be paying at least $20,000,000 less than we are paying.

Look at this table:

Table showing the average rate of cost per mile per annum for railroad transportation based on the aggregate length of routes.

Year.	Length of routes.	Total pay for transportation.	Average rate per mile.
	Miles.
1885	121,082	$14,758,495.00	$121.95
1886	123,933	15,520,191.00	125.23
1887	130,948	16,174,691.22	123.52
1888	143,719	17,528,599.80	121.97
1889	150,391	19,441,095.78	129.27
1890	154,779	20,869,231.55	134.83
1891	159,518	22,308,868.00	140.41
1892	162,576	24,196,329.71	148.83
1893	166,952	25,716,005.85	154.04
1894	169,768	27,152,091.16	159.94
1895	171,212	27,961,931.78	163.31

From this table it will be seen that the length of railroad mail routes in 1885 was 121,082 miles, and in 1897 the length was 173,475 miles, an increase of 52,443 miles. But has the total pay decreased as in the case of the increased star-route service? No; the total pay has more than doubled. In 1885 we paid $14,758,495 for railway mail service; in 1897 we paid $30,171,542.69. Some one will say that the weight of the mails carried by the railroads has increased. In reply I will ask if the weight of mails carried by star routes has not also increased? Again, some one will say that the number of miles of railway mail routes has increased more than the miles of star routes. That is true to a small extent, but the true way to compare them is to see what we pay per mile for each service.

In 1885 we paid $121.95 for each mile of railway mail route. The Postmaster-General at that time said that the price was too high. How much per mile did we pay last year, 1897? We paid $173.90 a mile. This is an increase of $52.05 for each mile of railway mail route. Now, remember that during the same time the cost for star-route service decreased $3.12 per mile.

Mr. President, will some one explain why the cost for star routes has decreased $3.12 for each mile while the pay to railroads has increased $52.05 for every mile of mail route? There is no explanation except the great and poisonous influence of the railroad monopolies in our politics, from the township primary up to the United States Senate. If there was a rich and powerful corporation with a monopoly of carrying the mail over the star routes, then we would have star-route kings contributing money to corrupt our politics and sending their powerful lobbies to Congress. And if this were the case, we would be paying to-day $30,000,000 for the star-route service instead of $5,000,000, which it now costs.

Why should it cost more to carry the mails on 173,475 miles of railroad mail routes than on 265,598 miles of star route? Every train will run, whether it carries any mail or not. What the Government pays for each pound of mail is that much extra profit for them. The mail adds very little to the cost of running each train. The increased weight is scarcely felt.

On the other hand, it is much more expensive to distribute the mail from the railroads over the country to every neighborhood in the United States. A man must take a stagecoach or a buggy or wagon over the sandy or muddy and sticky roads, over plains and over mountains, for the express purpose of carrying the mails. Therefore the adding of every pound of mail is a burden that is felt by the mail carrier.

Mr. President, it would seem that the expensive part of our mail system would be carrying the mail, the star routes covering 265,598 miles through the country districts. These star routes aggregate 92,123 miles longer than the railway mail routes. Yet to-day we are paying about six times as much to railroads as we pay for all the star routes.

That is not all. In addition to paying the railroads 6 cents a pound for each pound of mail, which amounts to over $30,000,000 a year, we are paying them rent for the cars in which the mail is carried. Do we pay the man who carries the mail over the star routes rent for his buggy, coach, or wagon? No. He is not rich and has no lobby here to influence Congress.

How much rent do we pay for the postal cars? We pay each year in rent more than the cars are worth.

There are 654 postal cars in use and 173 in reserve, making, in all, 827 cars. The Postmaster-General tells us in his report that these cars cost on an average about $3,500 apiece. Now, even if each car cost $4,000, then the whole lot (those in use and those in reserve) 827 in all, would cost, new, $3,308,000. Now, how much rent do we pay for these cars each year? The sum of $4,000,000. That is $692,000 more than the cars are worth. These cars will last twenty years, so in that time we will pay $80,000,000 rent for them. I have seen many steals go through Congress since I have been a member of this body, but this is the boldest and most barefaced steal I have ever known. This steal has not just begun; it has been going on for a quarter of a century.

These facts are so astounding that the people when they learn them will hardly be able to believe them; yet these facts are true, and no Senator will contradict them. I have offered an amendment to reduce the rent paid for cars from $4,000,000 to $1,000,000. This bill makes the rent paid each year 25 per cent of the value of the cars. Yet the railroad lobby will fight that amendment—in fact, they will fight any reduction in the steal.

But I will discuss the question of rent for postal cars further when that amendment comes up for a vote. The amendment now pending is to reduce the pay per pound for mail carried on railroads 20 per cent. This will save $6,000,000 a year to the Government and leave to the railroads a profit bigger than they get for anything else they haul. If we are to listen to the Senators who are supporting this steal and accept the very peculiar combination of doctored statistics prepared from various monopoly sources, this cost could not be reduced without affecting the service and crippling it. But they are wrong. They have gotten their information from the railroads; but I quote the facts from the official records.

As far back as 1887, eleven years ago, the Postmaster-General called attention sharply to the fact that under the discretion he has under the law he has been able greatly to reduce the cost for carrying the star-route mail and steamboat mail and at the same time secure increased efficiency, while he has not been able to decrease the pay to the railroads on account of the strict letter of the law which he could not violate, as he states. I will proceed to read from his report, where he says:

> The heavy additions to the annual expenditure are due to the item of railroad transportation, the cost of which is fixed by law and little governable by the Department.

That is not all. Following right on down the Postmasters-Generals' reports, we have in 1890 Postmaster-General Wanamaker, who makes a direct and specific recommendation that Congress ought to make a reduction of 20 per cent. In 1890 he said:

> In the past twelve years no reduction of rates has taken place, though the freight rates upon all railroads have been steadily lowered. During this period the weight of the mails has largely increased. It is quite reasonable to say that the reduction in freight rates generally between 1878 and 1890 is not less than 20 per cent, and in many instances it is much more. The largest expenditure of the Department is for transportation. The estimates just sent to the Treasury for the next fiscal year cover $22,610,128.31 for railroad transportation alone.

I could pile up evidence of that kind from official sources, but this is enough to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that these rates are entirely too high. Here are the statements from the heads of the Department showing that the rate ought to be reduced. There is not one of them who does not discuss it, and one Postmaster-General calls attention sharply to the fact that the decrease in other rates has been 20 per cent, and in many cases more than 20 per cent, while the charge to the Government by the railroads for the past twenty years has stood the same. That was in 1890.

If Postmaster-General Wanamaker was right in 1890, the reduction in freight rates has been more than 20 per cent up to now. It is reasonable to suppose that the reduction will be between 30 and 40 per cent in 1898. I have offered an amendment, but not one calling for a reduction of 40 per cent, although that is the general estimate of the reduction in freight rates and prices from 1878 until the present time. I believe myself that if a fair reduction were made and the Government had the benefit of the same general decline in prices and reduction that the public has, the rate would be reduced 40 per cent, which would make a saving of $12,000,000.

Yet I have offered an amendment for only 20 per cent, and the head of the Department seven years ago said the reduction ought to have been that much then. If the Postmaster-General was right in 1890, then we have paid the railroads more than $100,000,000 above a fair price since that time. The amendment to-day before the Senate calls for a reduction that the head of the Department said ought to have been made in 1890. I simply took that figure because it was the only definite and positive statement made giving the exact per cent, though it has been eight years since. There was another reason. Those who are trying to defeat this reduction have proposed to investigate so as to delay a year. I say, let us investigate, but let us reduce 20 per cent now and see how much more we should reduce then. If we had reduced the rate 20 per cent in 1890, as the Postmaster-General recommended, up to now there should be another reduction clearly.

What answer did the Committee on Appropriations make to this amendment? Mr. President, their answer is found on the last page of the pending appropriation bill, section 5, which provides for appointing a committee to investigate not the railroad pay alone, but to investigate everything, which will mean no investigation at all. It means a delay and then a whitewash.

Mr. President, that is an old dodge. Whenever there is any effort made in this body to protect the Government Treasury so as to lessen taxes, whenever a proposition is made for a reduction based on any fair basis which it is hard to combat, when it is difficult by argument to contradict the arguments in favor of it, we are at once confronted with a resolution for an investigation and then a sham is made of the investigation. We have seen it time and again. When it was proposed to reduce the telephone rates, as outrageously high as they were, with the uniformity of testimony that they were outrageously high, how was it met? A resolution was shot in at once to investigate. What was the purpose of the resolution to investigate? To kill time and to defeat the reduction for the present.

What is the purpose of this proposed investigation? It is to kill time and to defeat reduction. Some Senator may say that I ought not to make this statement, but it is my deliberate opinion that the only purpose of the amendment to investigate is to defeat the propcsition to reduce the rate 20 per cent. Who will be put on such a committee? Will any Senator or Member of the House who has taken a position in favor of reduction be put on it? Hardly. I should be very glad myself to see an investigation if it was composed of Senators and Members of the House, or anyone else who had the time to do it, and by persons who have shown that they were not, I was about to say, incapable of seeing both sides.

When I say that, I do not mean to reflect upon the honesty of Senators or Members; but human nature is such that when a man looks at one side of a question from his early manhood up until he is 40, 50, or 60 years old, it seems that he becomes incapable of seeing it from any other standpoint. Hence it is that we see men whose personal integrity, whose honor and whose character we can not question, constantly taking positions and expressing views of important questions that are hard to understand except on the theory of crystallized and ossified mental bias.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? I should like to ask him a question for information.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Nevada, while old in years, is yet young in mind, and I am sure he can appreciate the force of that remark. He is one of the youngest Senators here.

Mr. STEWART. The amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina proposes a horizontal reduction. Has it been investigated and ascertained whether that can be done with justice to all? Can not the roads that do a great deal of business afford to carry the mail for a less price than small roads that have very little of the service to do? Has that been investigated so that it is perfectly clear that a horizontal reduction would operate equally upon all, or has not that been investigated, and are not the details understood? I should like to have that explained.

Mr. BUTLER. The Committee on Appropriations investigated that question. They do not comment on it in the connection in which the Senator refers to it; but they have given in their report a table that answers the question exactly. They have shown that when a road carries an average of 200 pounds of mail on a trip it gets as high as $1.17 per ton per mile, while a road which carries as much as 100,000 pounds on a trip gets 6 cents per ton per mile. The table is as follows:

Average weight per day over whole length of route.	Tons per mile per year (365 days).	Compensation per mile per year.	Compensation per ton per mile.
Pounds.
200	36.50	$42.75	$1.1712
500	91.25	64.12	.7027
1,000	182.50	85.50	.4685
1,500	273.75	108.87	.3904
2,000	365.00	128.25	.3514
3,500	638.75	149.62	.2342
5,000	912.50	171.00	.1874
7,000	1,277.50	192.37	.1506
10,000	1,825.00	224.42	.1228
20,000	3,650.00	331.27	.0908
50,000	9,125.00	651.82	.0714
100,000	18,250.00	1,186.07	.0650

This shows that the pay is enormous when a road carries a small amount of mail a day, according to the present law.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina whether it is not true that, although it is the largest per ton per mile, really it is the worst paid of all?

Mr. BUTLER. By no means. Every small road is better paid for carrying the mail than for any other service that it renders to the public.

Take any small road in the country, say 10 or 20 or 50 miles long. That road, just like every other road, will run its train or trains every day anyway. That train will run every day, carrying fifteen or twenty passengers. It will run every day, carrying 1 ton or 20 tons of freight. That train is going to run. It is going to make every trip whether it carries the mail or not. Now, what mail it gets to carry is so much extra. That road could afford to carry the mail whether it got $1.17 a ton or one-tenth of what it is paid. Such a road, or any road, would be glad to take the mail for the highest class freight rate; yet, according to law, such a road that carries even 200 pounds a day gets $1.17 per ton per mile, while it gets for freight from 2½ cents per ton per mile down to as low as one-half of a cent per ton per mile.

These figures are from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission and from Poor's Railroad Manual for 1897. I have the report here.

Mr. STEWART. Has the Senator the law there which makes that provision?

Mr. FAULKNER. I have given, in my remarks, seven or eight short and small roads in which in every instance the actual figures given by Mr. Knott show conclusively that the rate for freight on those small roads is far in excess of the rate paid by the Government for carrying the mails.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator gets his facts from railroad officials. I get mine from official and disinterested sources. But I challenge the Senator from West Virginia to find a single railroad in the United States that gets for freight as much as a dollar per ton per mile. If there were such a case, it would be an extreme exception. Now, the Senator can go out and get every railroad man in the country to put their wits to work; and yet, with their help, and getting them all together to hunt up or doctor all the special cases possible, I challenge him to find such an occurrence.

The Senator from Nevada wants to know the exact language of the law. I have looked it up twenty times, but I did not happen to lay it on my desk to-day. However, I will give him the reference, so that he can get it from the Revised Statutes in one moment. It is section 4002 of the Revised Statutes, as amended in 1876 by a reduction of 10 per cent, and as amended again in 1878 by a reduction of 5 per cent. I can send for it in one moment.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator need not trouble himself about it now if he has not got it at hand.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator, if he will permit me, that I gave a number of instances in which the roads got $2.40 per ton, as he will find in my remarks. In other words, they get 12 cents a hundred, and in some cases 16 cents a hundred, on those short roads.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator's remarks were not published in the RECORD this morning, so I have not been able to see them. But even if he is correct, an isolated case proves nothing. I have in my hand Poor's Railroad Manual for 1897. It groups the States into eight divisions, showing the amount of freight hauled in each division and the price collected per ton per mile. The highest price collected for freight is in the group of sparsely settled Western States. What is the average freight charge in those States? Here are the figures, which I read: 2.33 cents per ton per mile. In every other group the freight charge is less. The average is 0.821 cent per ton per mile. The lowest rate is in the densely populated sections, and is much less. Eight-tenths of a cent per ton per mile is the average freight charge for the whole country. Out West it is 2.33 cents, which is the highest average.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from North Carolina will permit me, I am not speaking of the densely and thickly settled sections. I am speaking of short roads, where we pay a large amount for mails carried. I gave the actual cost of freight on the small roads connected with the Louisville and Nashville, and then gave the railroad commissioners' authority in Illinois and Georgia as to freight rates on those 10-mile roads. The rate ran from 16 cents down to 6 cents when the cost of the mail was 5½ cents.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator say those roads are on the Louisville and Nashville?

Mr. FAULKNER. They are mentioned in the evidence of Mr. Knott. He gives them there. I do not remember the names of the roads.

Mr. BUTLER. I will contradict the Senator's statement. He may be correct as to one or two extreme cases; but it is idle and foolish to waste time with one or two extreme cases. If we want the truth, let us compare the average charge for freight with the average charge for the mails. Poor's Railroad Manual, a standard authority, shows that in the Western group of States, where all of the roads run more or less over prairie country (and all the little, short roads out West go into an average), where they make the longest haul and carry the least freight and there is the greatest expense, the average is 2.33 cents per ton per mile for freight. That is official.

That is not taking one road here and one there and getting a detached case that is worth nothing as an illustration, but it is the highest average where freight costs the most and where the railroads haul the least, including the State of the Senator from Nevada, including Utah, including New Mexico, including Oklahoma, and including all the sections where there are the fewest people per square mile. This is my answer to the Senator from Nevada. We see that the small roads that got $1.17 per ton per mile for carrying the mails are getting from twenty to fifty times as much as they get for carrying freight. Why, with this reduction of 20 per cent they would still be getting an enormous pay for carrying the mails. Besides there is not a small road that would not run anyhow, whether it carried any mail or not. There is not a single one that would stop, and the pay for carrying the mail is just that much extra.

Now, Mr. President, I return to the point I was on. The proposition that the committee brings in here is not to reduce these enormous charges, but to investigate. Mr. President, without reflecting on any man's honesty or integrity, I wish to say that it is a proposition to whitewash; it is a proposition not to investigate, to cook up a lot of figures to try to mystify this whole question and prevent Congress from making a reduction. Why do I say it? Because I do not suppose we could get a committee made up of men of higher character and of greater learning than the Committee on Appropriations, and yet they have made an investigation.

Here it is. It is as clear as mud. Yet the committee offer it, and say that it is fair and shows that there should be no reduction. If the committee think that, then let us fight it out now, and decide to reduce or not to reduce. If the committee think rates are now low enough, why do they propose to investigate? That dodge is offered to keep from now facing the issue square.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think that is unjust to the Committee on Appropriations. We have not made such an investigation, and that is the reason why we agreed to the amendment to make a thorough investigation. We did not have the time nor the opportunity, and therefore took only the best information we could get within the small space of time we were allowed to consider this matter. The committee deemed it of sufficient importance to have a more thorough and exhaustive investigation, and for that reason they recommended the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad to get that information from the Senator, because the Senator [Mr. QUAY] who has charge of this bill has put into the RECORD a statement to the effect that the committee had made an investigation that was fair and satisfactory to the committee. I will read his language. I will not do him any injustice.

Mr. HALE. Was not the amendment put on as it came to the Committee on Appropriations from the Post-Office Committee of the Senate?

Mr. FAULKNER. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads recommended it and the Committee on Appropriations put it on.

Mr. HALE. I understood that the Post-Office Committee of this body was the committee that initiated the investigation and sent it to the Committee on Appropriations and requested that it be put on, and in accordance with that request the committee put it on. It did not originate in the Committee on Appropriations; it originated in the Senator's own committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. In justice to the Senator from North Carolina I want to say that in the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, when we adopted the amendment and asked the Committee on Appropriations to put it upon the bill, the Senator from North Carolina gave notice that he would not cease on that account at this session to press the subject of a reduction of the mail pay to the railroads; and I am afraid he made in the committee then and there some sort of a charge like that which he has now made, that the intention to dispose of the subject at the present session by means of a commission was only to delay action and whitewash the railroads. Words of that kind the Senator, I think, used. I thought perhaps they were unjust. But the Senator from North Carolina waived none of his rights which he is now exercising rather freely on the floor of the Senate by reason of any action taken in the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. HALE. But the Senator from New Hampshire bears out my impression that the amendment originated with the Post-Office Committee and was sent by them to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was, and it was put on the bill by the Appropriations Committee at the request of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. A year ago last February the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads made a similar request and reported a proposition for an inquiry. The Appropriations Committee adopted a different plan, for the Committee on Appropriations then proposed an inquiry. The two schemes came together. The Appropriations Committee's method was not satisfactory to the Post-Office Committee, and the Post-Office Committee's method proposed was not satisfactory to the Committee on Appropriations. There was a debate in the Senate; the two goats butted each other off the bridge, and neither proposition was adopted.

Mr. HALE. Here the two committees are in accord.

Mr. CHANDLER. The committees are in accord now.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to say just a word, by the leave of the Senator from North Carolina. I had charge of this bill once or twice as chairman of the subcommittee. It always seemed to me that there ought to be a more thorough investigation of this question than the Committee on Appropriations could well give it, and that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads or the joint committee ought to make that investigation.

We undertook to make it as well as we could at this session, and made a report here of the testimony taken, but so far as I was concerned I was perfectly willing that the committee specially charged with the control of post-office legislation should take the matter up and give it a thorough investigation before we got through and see what we ought to do to a dead certainty, if it was possible to find out. I repel any suggestion, if it is made, that there is any purpose of delay or means of continuing any unlawful or extraordinary charge on the part of the railroads. I want to find out what the truth is.

Mr. BUTLER. I am in favor of an investigation if we can have a thorough one and bring out all the facts. But let us make this reduction of 20 per cent now and then investigate to see how much more reduction we should make. The proposition for an investigation as it comes from the Committee on Appropriations is not the proposition suggested by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. That was to investigate railway mail pay and rent for postal cars. That is as much as any committee can investigate; but the Committee on Appropriations has loaded it down with a number of other questions which it will be impossible for any committee to thoroughly investigate. I repeat, the whole thing will be a sham and a fraud.

I am glad to hear that the Senator from Illinois wants to get at the truth. If we were to have forty investigating committees he could not get more authentic facts, and could not go to a higher source to find them, than I am presenting now.

I am also glad the Senator from Illinois has at last realized that the Appropriations Committee is getting loaded up with too much work, and that with all their ability and wisdom and endurance and patience, and love of power I was about to say, they have at last reached the point where they realize that they have more on their hands than they can do as it ought to be done. Therefore I feel sure that the Senator from Illinois will join us in dividing the appropriation bills and putting this work on the Post-Office Committee, which will try to relieve them from some of the onerous and burdensome duties which they have acknowledged they were not able, probably on account of the limit of physical endurance, to carry out.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, one word in response to that remark. It is not the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to change the law. It is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to make the appropriations under the law. It is the duty of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to ascertain whether the law should be changed, and if so, to recommend that change to the Senate of the United States. So the Committee on Appropriations are not shirking any responsibility nor seeking any more than belongs to them under the statute.

Mr. BUTLER. Surely they would not seek any more, because it would be beyond human conception to give them more power than they have. That committee is the CZAR REED of the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. The Committee on Appropriations went just as far as its time would permit in the investigation of this subject, in order to deal properly with the question immediately before us. It has been said that the examination was ex parte. In a sense I suppose that is true, because the Post-Office Department, the express companies, and the railroad companies, through their representatives, were heard, and no one appeared before us to controvert their testimony. But that was not the fault of the Committee on Appropriations. Personally I had given notice to the Senator from North Carolina that we would hear him or any witness he had to present at any time before the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator did give me that notice.

Mr. QUAY. And the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] was a member of the subcommittee which conducted the hearing.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Illinois, I will say that the Committee on Appropriations change laws whenever they desire to do so, and originate laws whenever they desire to do so. We have learned by sad experience that about the only way to get any law that affects any Department on an important matter enacted is to get it to run the gantlet of their committee. Whenever they can be convinced that a law needs to be changed, it is changed, and it goes through on an appropriation bill with all the force of that bill and the committee behind it.

The Senator knows that every amendment which has been made on this question of railway mail pay in the past has been made on the Post-Office appropriation bill. He knows it is next to impossible to start a separate measure and put it through. He knows it was recognized in 1876 as a proper question to go on the appropriation bill and was put there. He knows that in 1878 it was recognized that it was a proper piece of legislation to go on the appropriation bill and it was put there. He knows that every precedent shows it ought to go on the appropriation bill.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will ask the Senator whether or not the reductions referred to were not made on the appropriation bill at the suggestion of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as almost all other amendments changing laws are made on appropriation bills? The particular committee having charge of the subject-matter approves an amendment and sends it to the Appropriations Committee, which then acts upon it; and was not that the case in both of the instances to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. BUTLER. It is easier to ask that question than to answer it. If the Senator from West Virginia had been sure, he would have stated it as a fact. I could look it up and tell him exactly what the fact is, but it is immaterial, because it makes no difference what recommendations our committee have made, for if a particular amendment does not meet the pleasure of the Committee on Appropriations, that supreme head, that inner sanctuary of power, the amendment does not go in. But, on the other hand, whenever that committee wants to originate laws, they do it, and for no other committee's recommendation. But that has nothing to do with this question now.

Mr. President, I was about to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] had put into the RECORD the statement that there had been an investigation made, and a fair one. The Senator from Pennsylvania was out when some of his colleagues denied that fact. Of course the issue is between them. I simply read what the Senator from Pennsylvania said, and will let it go into the RECORD.

Mr. QUAY. As I said before, we made the investigation of this subject so far as our time in the committee would permit, and, so far as my own opinion is concerned, I think it was a fair investigation. I have not heard any allegation from any quarter that it was unfairly conducted.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, with the permission of the Senator from North Carolina, whether anyone was heard except on the side of the railroads?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes; the post-office officials were heard.

Mr. QUAY. No one came before us on the other side, and the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from North Carolina, who favor the amendment which is now before the Senate, did not produce any witnesses, although they were asked to do so.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know what may have been the delinquencies of the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from North Carolina, but as a matter of fact I never heard that an investigation was being made. I only want to have the fact made of record that there was nobody there except on the side of the railroads. The Senator from Pennsylvania says he could not find anybody else. How he undertook to find anybody else except by notifying the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from South Dakota I do not know.

Mr. HALE. Now, let me ask the Senator himself when the Committee on Appropriations, through a subcommittee, summoned the heads of these railroad and express companies, and also summoned the officers in the Post-Office Department, who are upon neither side, and then notified Senators who represented the other side that they would be glad to hear anybody that they would produce, what more could the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations do than that? Who would the Senator say they should have sent for, representing what we will call the other side? When those Senators had made their desires known by submitting amendments and were presumed to represent the other side and to know who would give testimony, what more would the Senator from New Hampshire say that that subcommittee should have done?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am bound to say that that makes a pretty fair case, as business is done in the Appropriations Committee——

Mr. HALE. In any committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. In behalf of the subcommittee. Now, I prefer to confine myself to the case the Senator put. I think that makes a pretty fair case, so far as the committee is concerned, and the Senator from North Carolina, who represents this side of the case, can judge whether he had a sufficient opportunity to be heard or not.

Mr. BUTLER. I represent the side of equity as I see it, if that is one side or both. I am not here as a partisan for the railroads or as a partisan against them, and I hope no one else is. Why should it be my duty to appear before the committee to rebut the statements of railroad attorneys any more than the duty of any other Senator? Why does the Senator refer to me as "a Senator on the other side?" Are there some Senators on the railroad side?

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand the Senator believes there should be a reduction.

Mr. BUTLER. I am giving the official facts and my reasons why equity demands such a reduction.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know why the Senator from North Carolina did not appear before the committee; but, of course, there are to be found in this broad world men who think the mail pay ought to be reduced. I have not formed an opinion on the subject except generally. I have a general impression that the mail pay is too large. I am willing to make an investigation to see whether it is or not; but I am not prepared to vote for an arbitrary reduction of the mail pay until there is an investigation. It seems, however, whatever the reasons may be, that there was but one side of the case presented to the Appropriations Committee, and that was the railroad side.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from New Hampshire is very adroit in putting a whole speech of his own into a few sentences and getting it in the midst of some other Senator's speech. I say a whole speech, because he said all there was to say against reduction. The Senator from West Virginia stood up this morning for three hours and labored and labored through a remarkable speech, but he said no more than the Senator from New Hampshire has just said.

With as high an opinion as I had of that Senator's ability and as high an opinion as I had of his capacity to master details and to confuse facts through misty and mazy directions—I have seen some evidences of his prowess before—but I was particularly astonished at him this morning when he rose to the height of his capacity to confuse and mystify a simple question. He stood up for three hours and talked about one-hundredth of one-thousandth per cent per ton and one-thousandth of one-millionth of a cent per ton per mile, until every man in the Chamber and the galleries who was trying to listen to him would be forced to give up and rest his intellect for a moment, and then come back and try to follow him again.

I do not know how many listened to him, but it was a tax on any mental machinery to have followed all that labyrinth of statement, those per cents on per cents and per tons on per tons per mile. He went through it and then went over it and went forward and went back; and when it comes to be put down into the RECORD, unless he very wisely after the vote is taken puts in a few more elucidating sentences to interpret some of those mental hieroglyphics, a Philadelphia lawyer would not be able to tell what was the result of all his arguments, so mystifying and befogging were they. After he had gone along for three hours, here was his speech in one sentence:

> Now, I have shown that absolutely the railroad companies are not getting enough pay. They will be crippled and the service will be crippled if it is reduced. It ought to be more, in fact, but in the interest of fairness and to prevent a reduction let us have the fullest investigation.

That is the only argument there is to make; that is the only argument that the adroit and shrewd and eloquent Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] made, and he left off the three hours of mystifying figures and simply made the only speech there is to make, which shows clearly the purpose of this amendment.

We had reached a time when it was impossible for the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from West Virginia, and other Senators to answer the arguments for a reduction; we had reached a time when there were no arguments with which to answer, and therefore it was necessary to propose to investigate.

Mr. President, all the information that is necessary ought to be collected each year by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Why is it that the express companies and railroad companies are not required to give to the Government all the information each year which is needed?

The Senators who are so much concerned about having an investigation, it seems to me, would have had the interstate-commerce act amended before now, so as to give to that body—that beautiful ornament drawing salaries and begging the railroads occasionally to notice them and give them a little information, if they do not object—the power at least to get such information. Why is it that they have not proposed to empower that commission to get this information, and have the reports made regularly by every public carrier in the country and by the great monopolies who have valuable franchises and who conduct businesses which affect the welfare of every man, woman, and child in America?

We have not done it. But we must have a special committee to accept and publish a lot of statements from the smartest lawyers the world can produce and that millions of money can employ. They will come forward with their statements all prepared, all drawn, of course, to cover every possible phase of the question and to throw darkness instead of light on the facts. The committee will ask them questions, but what kind of answers will they get? An officer or attorney representing a railroad company who is under oath can think of forty thousand ways of dodging a question, and when he can not think of another way his memory fails him, and he can not remember.

I never have seen one yet who was able to think or to remember whenever his corporation got where you were about to get to the truth and it would seriously affect the treasury of the corporation.

Mr. President, if I were an attorney for such a corporation I would be forced to go through the same mental manipulations or lose my job. I do not know which I would do if I was in such a place and getting $50,000 a year salary. I think I know; but I have never been placed under such circumstances.

We are to have an investigation. That is sure, because the Senator from South Dakota and I will not antagonize this proposition to investigate; and even if we did, it might pass; but I am stating its purpose; I am stating clearly its purpose; and one year from to-day, when the Post-Office appropriation bill again comes up for consideration, I will be able to turn to the RECORD and read my statement and prove it by the kind of report the commission will make to us. I know we have got to face this one year from to-day, and I know that we are going to have a report that will make out a case just as this one does now for the railroads.

We will have a report that will justify the Senator from West Virginia to stand up and make the astonishing statement which he makes here this morning—and I want his attention, for I do not want to misrepresent him. A year from to-day we shall have the Senator from West Virginia standing up and quoting from a prepared report, saying that we are paying less for mail than the railroad companies get for freight or express or passengers. The Senator made that statement this morning. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General made that statement in his evidence. Let Senators grasp that statement if they can.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from North Carolina has not correctly stated my position at all.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to have it, then. I called the Senator's attention for that purpose.

Mr. FAULKNER. I spoke of first-class freight on certain roads I mentioned.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator says that on first-class freight on certain roads the freight pays the railroads more than do the mails. I did not hear the names of the railroads the Senator gave, but if he wants to create the impression—and I am sure he does not, for it would be unfair—that that applies generally, or applies in any case unless in a most extreme exception, then he creates a most false impression.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator will look at my remarks, he will see that I stated that those were the rates in Kentucky, Illinois, and in Georgia, fixed by the railroad commissions on all routes of a certain length. The Senator will further find that he can not compare the average at all in order to get a true statement of the cost per mile, taking all the routes in the United States. You have got to take the large routes, carrying a large amount over 5,000 pounds, and put them in one class, and those carrying under 5,000 pounds and put them in another class. The latter is a great deal higher rate than the former.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator read a statement made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and then proceeded to comment upon and indorse it, which, in a general way, is the statement to which I refer.

On page 121 of the testimony, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] asked the Second Assistant Postmaster-General a leading question. He asked him if he would state in the presence of the committee, and not let it leak out to the railroads, a certain confidential statement; and Mr. Shallenberger proceeded to make the confidential statement in reply to the committee, so as not to let any railroad company get this information. It is as follows:

> That, in the presence of this committee, would be my conclusion, very clearly stated. I have not so stated it to any one of the companies; but, in the presence of this committee, I can state emphatically that I have been surprised to find that the rates allowed under the operation of the present law were less, proportionately, in my judgment, considering cost of service, than the rates of compensation allowed them by express companies or passenger traffic, and in some instances by high-class freight.

He makes a general statement covering freight and passenger rates, and then says in some cases high-class freight. The burden of those who attempt to argue against a reduction is that we ought to compare the cost of carrying the mail with the passenger service. I notice that the officers of the railroad companies in their testimony all said that it would be fair to compare the cost of carrying the mail with the cost of carrying passengers. I notice that the Post-Office Department leans strongly the same way. I notice the Senator from Pennsylvania repeats the statement when having this evidence of the railroad attorneys printed. He says:

> They were examined at much length and testified fairly, I think, to the satisfaction of the entire committee; and the consensus of opinion in the committee, unless disputed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], was that the Government received a better and a cheaper service from the railroad companies in the transportation of the mails than do passengers or shippers of freight or express companies.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, that was the necessary conclusion from the testimony before us, and I do not think the Senator from North Carolina will dispute it.

Mr. BUTLER. That is true; but what I complain of is that a committee of this Senate should put before us here ex parte statements which are manufactured by men who are paid high salaries for that purpose—a high class of attorneys paid to make a partisan showing in all cases and to defeat justice in all cases.

That is what they are paid for, and there is not a high-priced attorney of a railroad in the United States who could refuse to do the work they call on him to do without losing his job.

I know a few attorneys who have refused to swear that they could not get a fair trial for their railroads in a community. I have known a few who refused to go and lobby before my State legislature, but they lost their jobs at once. It is that class of attorneys who never refused to stoop to any work they are told to do, however questionable, who are sent to appear before committees to furnish such testimony. What I complain of is that a committee of this body should listen to them and accept their statements and then tell us that they have made a fair investigation.

Mr. QUAY. I wish merely to say that, while some of these corporations were represented before the committee by attorneys, they were largely represented by the officers of the companies themselves.

Mr. BUTLER. That does not make one particle of difference. There was a time when an officer of a railroad company—for instance, its president—represented something besides a mere hired agent of a syndicate; there was a time when such a man was a free agent, but it is no longer so. To-day the presidents of these railroad companies are as much the servants of the syndicate which owns the railroads as a hired attorney is when he is told to lobby, and to lie, if necessary, for a railroad company or lose his job.

We have to-day in this country a railroad trust; we have to-day a few great bankers who control them; we have to-day a majority of the stock of many of them owned abroad; and railroad presidents are simply hired agents occupying no higher position than a common attorney who takes a retainer and does any and all work by the year for the company. The statements, therefore, of the officers of the company are on no higher plane than would be those of a retained attorney who does all kinds of work and never refuses to carry out any order.

Mr. President, what I complain of is that a committee of this Senate, representing men of as high intelligence, men of as high character, holding the most responsible positions in this Senate, would sit and hear such ex parte partisan testimony, prepared by hired agents who had to make out a good case, whether they were attorneys or presidents of railroad companies, or lose their jobs—for this committee to accept such statements and to come in and tell us they are fair, and base their recommendations on them, and say, "do not reduce the rate of payment."

There is not a member of that committee—I hope this is not personal, but it is so patent that I will say it—there is not a member of that committee, if he had these railroads employed to carry mail for him, but who would have taken the trouble to cross-examine those men, and he would have gone out and endeavored in some way to test the truth of their statements instead of accepting them blindfolded. I say there is not a single one who would have taken such statements in his private business and who would have turned around and said, "We will accept the rates as fair and pay you what you ask without investigation."

Mr. President, we have a right to expect more than that of any committee of this body. The Senator from Pennsylvania, after giving the railroad testimony and saying it was fair and recommending to the Government that it be accepted just as the paid attorneys had given it, then says on page 5206 of the RECORD:

> Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, this was the consensus of the opinion of the representatives of some forty or fifty railway corporations; and, as a matter of course, it suggested itself to the committee that the railway companies were probably interested in establishing their view of the case.

Well, I should say it would certainly suggest itself to the committee.

> Accordingly, the Post-Office Department was sought, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in whose charge the railway transportation is, was brought before the committee. He testified very intelligently and at some length, and the conclusions derived from the hearings of the Department were exactly—> were exactly those which were derived from the statements of the railway companies. I will ask that the examination of Second Assistant Postmaster-General Shallenberger shall be inserted in the RECORD.

Mark the language—

Then it follows.

That is a remarkable state of affairs. Here are forty high-priced attorneys, who are sent here to get up a statement which will make a fair showing for the railroads; not only fair, but one which will show that they ought not to have their present pay reduced, but goes further and shows that they are not paid enough. Then here comes the Post-Office Department and corroborates every claim the railroad companies make and every statement and every figure they produce. Did the Department furnish the railroad attorneys with their statements, or did the attorneys furnish the Department with its statement? As the Senator from Pennsylvania says, they are exactly alike. It is a strange coincidence to say the least.

I say it is astonishing that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General should come in and corroborate every claim made by these corporations. Further than that I will not comment on it except to prove by facts and figures that the case made out by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General for the Government is not as favorable as it should have been.

I propose now, Mr. President—and to this I invite the attention of the Senator from West Virginia, who, I regret, is not in his seat—to answer the three propositions laid down by that Senator, laid down by the Senator from Pennsylvania, laid down by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and laid down by forty railroad attorneys.

The first of the three propositions is that the Government is getting a better service to-day for less money than private individuals are getting. They say that applies absolutely to express and passenger rates, and in a great many cases to freight. I have here the facts that are from as high an authority as can be quoted. These facts prove that every one of those claims is untrue. What I am going to state now are not figures taken from newspapers, they are not taken from attorneys, they are not taken from persons who are fighting the railroads; but these facts are taken from Poor's Railroad Manual.

I tried to get the facts of the Interstate Commerce Commission and was notified that they could not furnish them. I tried to get them from a branch of the Government. Then I turned to Poor's Railroad Manual, and I got these facts. If they are not correct, then that standard work is wrong. If they are correct, they command the attention of every Senator on this floor. If they are correct, they demand that every Senator shall either answer them satisfactorily or vote for a reduction in the pay. All these facts are from Poor's Railroad Manual. I say they cover the three points, and they are the three points made by those on the other side.

Poor's Manual of Railroads for 1897 gives statistics of freight traffic for thirteen years, 1884–1896, made up for the United States as a whole and also as grouped into eight divisions. In 1896 the total freight in the United States was 773,868,716 tons, carried 93,885,853,634 miles, on which the gross earnings were $770,424,013, an average per ton per mile of 0.821 cent (a little over four-fifths of a cent).

Mr. President, what do those figures teach? One ton, at the rate of 0.821 cent, for 328 miles—that is, the average haul of postal matter—comes to $2.68, which is less than one-seventh of a cent a pound. I made that statement once, and it was contradicted. I call the attention of Senators to the fact and make it again, and here are my figures for it. Poor's Railroad Manual shows that the average price paid for carrying a ton of freight 328 miles, which is the average run for mail, is less than one-seventh of a cent per pound.

The Senator from West Virginia says, however, that the pay which is given for freight is greater than that for mail. The average pay is less than one-seventh of a cent a pound for 328 miles, which is the average run for mail. The Senator from West Virginia has contradicted that statement in his speech. I give my authority. I challenge him to question these facts and this authority.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state that I have given my authority. It is the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BUTLER. The Post-Office Department will not contradict these figures. The Senator from West Virginia called attention to the fact, however, that there are exceptional cases where freight is carried at a very high rate. Poor's Railroad Manual takes the States where freights are highest, where there are fewer people per square mile and less freight carried, and puts all those sparse sections in one group, and it shows that in that sparsely settled section the price paid for carrying freight per pound for 328 miles, the average distance for mail, is less than one-third of a cent. That is in Nevada, Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, New Mexico, and all that arid country.

The price for freight out there is less than one-third of a cent a pound for 328 miles, and it is less than one-seventh when you take an average of the whole country, while we pay 6 cents a pound for mail. These are the facts. Therefore, to say that mail is carried cheaper than freight is absurd. We pay forty-two times as much for every pound of mail as the average price for carrying freight in this country according to Poor's Railroad Manual. I repeat, and there is not a Senator who will get on his feet and contradict the statement, that we pay forty-two times as much for each pound of mail as the average price for a pound of freight for 328 miles, which is the average distance mail is carried. There is one of the railroad propositions that goes to the ground.

But they say next that we get a better service at less price than do the express companies. I have gathered a number of figures on that point, but I think the statements made by the Senator from South Dakota on Friday were probably the most authentic that could be gathered. He took them from the census, and the facts which he gathered from the census show, when taking the total amount of the Adams Express business, the total amount of pounds, the total amount paid, that the railroad companies got for each pound of express matter carried six-tenths of a cent per pound.

What will that show? It will show that the railroad companies and the express companies combined, two great corporations, both charging for express, one getting four-tenths of a cent and the other six-tenths, yet charged but a cent and a half on each pound over the entire United States, the railroads getting six-tenths of a cent. I say that is the only authentic information and is nearest to being absolutely correct, so far as the evidence before this body is concerned, of anything yet presented. I know as far as my own observation goes, as far as my limited experience has gone with the shipping of truck from North Carolina to New York and with the shipping of small bundles from here down to my home, that we pay more for mail than we pay for express.

What is the third proposition? I am able to get that from Poor's Railroad Manual. Every railroad attorney in this investigation says we ought to compare the cost of carrying mail with passenger fare. That is the claim set up by them. I am going to compare what we pay for the mails with the passenger fare, and I am going to show that we pay more for carrying the mail per pound than the passengers pay per pound to be carried. Inasmuch as the Senator from West Virginia made the leading speech for the other side, I call his attention especially to what I am going to say, as I do not want him to overlook it. If he has any reply, I want to hear it. We all know that passenger fare is the highest transportation charge that railroads collect outside of the mail. They state that it is the highest.

Poor's Railroad Manual has another table, which gives the statistics of passenger traffic for the same thirteen years—from 1884 to 1896. It groups the States in the same way. It makes the unit a passenger. In the other case it made the unit a ton. Here are the figures: More than 585,000,000 passengers were carried over 13,000,000,000 miles, at an average charge of less than 2.4 cents (2.034) apiece per mile. That makes the fare of a passenger for 328 miles a little over $6.65.

Assuming a passenger and his baggage to weigh 200 pounds, each pound of passenger is carried at less than 3½ cents per pound. If these facts are correct, I want to ask how the Committee on Appropriations can ask us to delay another year in reducing this pay. Will they ask us to believe the statements of railroad attorneys rather than the facts from such a high authority?

Poor's Railroad Manual is considered a standard authority. It no doubt gathered these facts in the way the census is gotten up, and probably was influenced as little by the concern of the public Treasury or the pay to the railroads as it would be possible for any such publication to be influenced. Yet these figures giving the total number of passengers, the total miles traveled, the total compensation, show that each pound of passenger pays less than 3½ cents for 328 miles, while we pay 6 cents for each pound of mail for the same distance.

There has not been a single person to claim that we pay less than 5½ cents a pound for mail. In the other branch of Congress there was a contention whether we paid 8 cents or 7 cents or 6 cents, and the person who stood up stoutest against reduction claimed we did not pay over 6 cents a pound. The Senator from South Dakota gives it at between 5 and 6 cents a pound.

It does no good to split hairs over details. Every person who has spoken on this question admits it is over 5 cents, and all the difference there is is between 5 cents and 8 cents, some Senators claiming one figure and some another, according to how much mail is carried; some claiming you ought to count free matter, some claiming you ought not to count it; some claiming you ought to count all the mail carried over star routes, and some claiming you ought to make a reduction for star routes of 10 per cent or 20 per cent; and making different calculations. But everybody agrees that we pay between 5½ and 8 cents, somewhere, for each pound of mail that goes over the railroads.

Every railroad attorney whose evidence is here says that all they ask for carrying the mail is to pay as high as they get for passenger fare. If we reduce the pay 20 per cent, the railroads will still get more for each pound of mail than they get for each pound of passenger. Will any man outside of a lunatic asylum affirm that it is worth more to carry a couple of 100-pound sacks of mail in the usual way than to carry an average passenger in one of the fastest and most sumptuous trains in the United States?

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania complains that he could not get anybody before the committee to testify, that he invited me. I went to the committee to give such evidence as this which I have gathered. I was invited. I went on the day fixed. I was notified by letter the day the committee was to meet. I went and bundled up all these documents. I took all my authorities for the figures I had made, but when I got to the committee room I was notified that the day had been changed and I had not been notified. I think I found the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in the committee room alone with the clerk of the committee. I was very busy and was not able to go again.

I did not stay away because I was not willing to give them what information I could get. I carried as many books as I could carry tied up in strings and under my arms with all my manuscript and figures to the committee, and every fact I am giving now would be in the testimony if the committee had been in session that day. But that is not material. The committee itself admitted at the time, though now it seems to lay great stress on the investigation, that it had to make a hurried investigation.

If I had felt that the committee was seriously considering my amendment I should have taken the time to go to the committee meeting, but it was perfectly evident that the recommendation for investigation was all that the committee was going to do. It was perfectly evident that it thought that was the best way to pass this matter over. Therefore I decided to put these matters into the RECORD at this time.

Mr. President, it sometimes surprises me that there is a Senator left on the floor who would take the trouble to investigate such matters and give the Senate what information he can. There is such an air, such an atmosphere, around that it would be so much better for us to let these things drift and not interfere with these vested rights of monopolies, that a man would get along more agreeably, that it would be pleasanter all around, that it would be easier for a man to get along and get reelected, probably, without arousing this opposition, that I am surprised at myself sometimes when I dare to bring such facts before the Senate.

In this country we have put such tremendous power into the hands of a few men—and none have more power than our great railroad magnates—till it is almost worth a man's political life to stand on the floor of the Senate and demand that justice be done. There is not a man who has ever done it but has felt the sting of their opposition. There is not a man who has ever done it but that he has felt a stab in the dark in his back. There is not a man who has ever done it but who knows that he could buy peace and buy compliments from railroad organs if he would keep his mouth shut. Why is it? I do not know.

It is bothersome to have convictions anyway. A man gets nothing for them. Will the Senator from South Dakota make another political friend in South Dakota by his speech, or would he have lost one if he had not made the speech he made here? The Senator has made a lot of other speeches, and he could have circulated them in South Dakota, and there is not a political friend in the State who would not have stood by him if he had not made the speech demanding this reduction. Can it be charged he was doing it for political advancement? The Senator could no doubt get more political advancement if he had kept his mouth shut.

Mr. President, our forefathers passed a very wise law once—so wise that it is not being carried out, I am sorry to say. At the first session of the Fifth Congress in 1798, Congress passed a law, and I will ask the Secretary to read section 8. It is the section making an importer ineligible to be Secretary of the Treasury, and it goes further than that, but the other part has never been enforced.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no person appointed to any office instituted by this act shall directly or indirectly be concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, or be owner in whole or in part of any sea vessel, or purchase by himself, or another in trust for him, any public lands or other public property, or be concerned in the purchase or disposal of any public securities of any State or of the United States, or take or apply to his own use any emolument or gain for negotiating or transacting any business in the said Department other than what shall be allowed by law; and if any person shall offend against any of the prohibitions of this act, he shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and forfeit to the United States the penalty of $3,000, and shall upon conviction be removed from office, and forever thereafter incapable of holding any office under the United States: Provided, That if any other person than a public prosecutor shall give information of any such offense, upon which a prosecution and conviction shall be had, one-half of the aforesaid penalty of $3,000, when recovered, shall be for the use of the person giving such information.

Mr. BUTLER. Under that act, if it was properly construed as I understand it, our present Secretary of the Treasury could not hold his position. I do not think he is eligible under this act.

There was another effort made specifically referring to certain persons to prevent them from being eligible to seats in Congress. That effort was made to get an amendment to the Constitution, but the amendment was not adopted. It can be found in the Journal of the Senate, page 502, first session Second Congress.

A motion was made and seconded to propose to the legislatures of the several States the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States, to wit:

Article I, section 8: After the words "general welfare of the United States" add "in the cases hereinafter particularly enumerated;" and at the end of the section add "but no power to grant any charter of incorporation, or any commercial or other monopoly, shall be hereby implied."

"SEC. 9. Every tax shall be deemed direct other than taxes on imports, excises, transfers of property, and law proceedings."

At the end of the section add: "No member of Congress shall be eligible to any office or profit under the authority of the United States, nor shall any person intrusted with the management of money of the United States or concerned in the direction or management of any bank or other moneyed corporation within the United States, be capable of a seat in either House of Congress."

Article III, section 1: After the words "obtain and establish" add "or in such of the State courts as the Congress shall deem fit."

On motion,

Ordered, That these propositions lie on the table.

If this act were enforced, and if this constitutional amendment, which was offered in the first session of the Second Congress, had become a law and been enforced, it is perfectly safe to say that the gold standard would not be fastened on this country to-day. It would have prevented that evil from creeping into our body politic, which has crept along since by such gradual stages that it has got a grip upon our Government so that we are nearly all of us blindfolded and look through glass darkly.

If we had gone a step further and passed an act—our forefathers could not foresee it was necessary—that no attorney of a great monopoly or corporation should be eligible to a seat in Congress, and the law had been enforced, it would not be necessary to-day for the Senator from South Dakota and myself to be calling attention to the outrageous price paid for the transportation of the mails, and which has been paid for twenty years, with no serious effort by those in charge of the committees to reduce it.

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from North Carolina certainly does not intend to intimate that the Committee on Appropriations, which reported this bill, is made up of attorneys for railroad companies?

Mr. BUTLER. I have not said that, but if what I said needs interpretation I will interpret it.

Mr. QUAY. It is utterly false, so far as the Senator from Pennsylvania is concerned.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not said it. But as I said, if what I did say needs interpretation I will proceed to interpret it.

Mr. QUAY. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know whether the Senator from Pennsylvania was ever an attorney for any corporation or not.

Mr. QUAY. I never was.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator states that he has not been. Mr. President, I stated that a law should be passed that a person who was an attorney for great corporations should not be eligible to a seat in Congress; monopolies, I had better say, because it ought to refer to those things which have a monopoly of the instruments of commerce. The small individual monopolies are not a part of the great system.

A monopoly that has an influence over a small territory is not so dangerous. It is those that have a grip upon the vitals of the Government from ocean to ocean, the railroad trusts that affect the interests of every town and hamlet and individual in the nation. It is the great railroad syndicate, ramifying every State and Territory and county, that can kill and make alive; that can build up one town or tear down another; that can build up one man's business or tear down another's; that can build up the Standard Oil Company and break up every other competitor in the oil business.

Mr. President, it is such power as that, it is such monopolies as those, that I refer to. I say men who are attorneys for them, men who have their being in that atmosphere, who imbibe their thoughts, who are their agents year after year to do their bidding—it makes no difference how wise they are, nor how good they are, nor how just they are, they will become biased. They will get into a frame of mind where they believe themselves that they are right.

An honest man who is wrong is the most dangerous and difficult man to deal with I have ever had to contend with. You know how to deal with a scoundrel who is wrong. You know how to deal with a dishonest man who is trying to do something dishonest. But take a man who is an upright man in his everyday life, a man who is honest in his individual transactions with his neighbor, a man who does his ordinary outward Christian duty, who does his duty to his family, who is a deacon of the church—for they nearly all of them are—Mr. President, take a man of that kind who gets his mind biased, and through life he is a partisan for that monopoly; everybody sees it but him.

Mr. President, a man ought to make his election whether or not he is going to put himself into that atmosphere, or whether or not he is going to be a legislator for all the people. I repeat the statement, that if such a law had been passed and had been enforced these enormous charges would have been reduced before now.

I have no prejudice against railroads. I have received many favors at their hands. They know how to be most gracious. They know how to make a man feel comfortable. They know how to extend little courtesies and favors that especially a man in public life enjoys and appreciates. They can do it in so many adroit ways and in such a delicate and handsome manner that it is pleasing. It makes a man have a better opinion of himself. It makes the community around think he is a man of more importance to see those courtesies extended to him. I might say that a man is scarcely human who is not influenced by those things to a certain extent, if they continue to be poured on him and he accepts them always as they come.

Mr. President, I have accepted some courtesies that railroads have extended to me; and I speak from experience when I say that when you begin to accept some of their favors, it is the hardest thing in the world to stop. They will not let you stop unless you refuse all. A man can sit down and reason to himself that it is not wrong, that it will not influence him, that he has a right to accept them and vote as he pleases. A man when once thus under the influence of monopoly favors is in as bad fix as an opium eater. A man who has a conscience will have the same struggle that De Quincey had. He realizes that the opium each day is getting its hold on him; he knows that he ought to break its clutches; and yet but one breaks its clutches and ninety-nine do not; it is too delicious to break; we postpone it until to-morrow; we play Spanish with it—we are lost.

Mr. President, it is not only so with the railroads, but also with the telegraph monopoly and express companies, and so on. We all must use these important agencies. Their courtesies in the shape of passes and franks are very convenient and save a great deal of money. When we accept these courtesies we never realize that their charges are too high. And if we are attorneys for them, at big salaries, we will probably never vote in the interest of the public where these monopolies are concerned. When a telegraph frank is offered me, why not accept it? It will save me several hundred dollars a year, and will I allow so small a thing influence my vote? Yet if I accept it, will I again think that it is any of my business to see whether or not there is equity being done to the public by that monopoly?

When an express frank is offered me, how easy it would be for me to sit down and think: I live on the Atlantic Coast Line; I live in a great trucking section, and have a truck farm; why, a crate of strawberries can be put on the cars there in the morning and get to me that evening by express; I would not have to buy them here at 25, 30, and 40 cents a quart, but could get them from home express free. All those things would run through my mind; I could not keep them out. Why, chickens and turkeys and all those things a man needs here, and he gets them better from home than he can buy them here, could be sent to me free. Now, why should not I accept an express frank?

Why could I not accept it and do like I have heard some as high-toned Christian gentlemen as I ever saw say: "I can accept this frank and yet I will go ahead and vote just like I would before and it will not influence me?" I do not think that a man ought to accept their courteous, valuable favors and then not reciprocate. But, Mr. President, these favors are extended to get the influence of public men and the votes of legislators. Can a legislator pay back such favors at the expense of the public with his vote? How does a legislator feel with his pockets full of franks and passes when the corporations come and ask him to vote for some job they want? He ought to have decency enough to resign and go home and pay back their courtesies out of his own pocket, and not pay it back by his own vote at the expense of the public.

Mr. President, I am no better than a lot of men who accept those franks and passes, but I do not think they ought to be accepted by members of Congress. To every one of us these courtesies have been extended or offered, and yet we are called upon every day almost to vote upon important questions of equity between the public and the monopolies that offered those courtesies. How many of us will do our duty under such circumstances if we have been accepting these courtesies? All this goes to show how hard it is for a man who is perfectly conscientious and honest to always know when he is doing his duty between the public and these corporations.

The people are at home. They trust us. They do not send spies up here to watch and to lobby us. They think we are their representatives and will do what is right. The corporations are around us all the time. They influence the best of us more or less. Why, a man here has everything to make him forget the people. We hear from one side all the time. We do not hear from the people. It is easy for us to convince ourselves that what the monopolies want is right, and of course when a man comes here who is an attorney for one of these great monopolies he is prejudiced to begin with. He will most likely vote wrong all the time. What is the result? The monopolies run Congress, and the man who protests is looked upon as an enemy to capital, and is often made to feel very lonely. This is what is the matter with Congress, and this is why the country is in the condition that it is.

Mr. President, this is a delicate subject. These are unpleasant and embarrassing things to say to brother Senators. It is probably improper to have done it, but it is what is in my mind, and I had as well say it. It is these things that prevent equity being done in this Chamber, and in the other, between the people and these monopolies. It is these things that prevent it, whether we are conscious of it or not. Every man can stop and look in his own conscience. I know how powerful those influences are, for I have experienced them.

I say it is discouraging to attempt to get a reduction made in high rates charged by any monopoly, or any other equity between the people and the corporations, because a man encounters no encouragement from men for whom we have such high regard, for men for whom we have the highest respect. We encounter everything to encourage us not to do it, not to look into it. We feel it, anyway.

Mr. President, this was not what I had intended to say. I had intended to present facts, and I was simply going to call attention to the fact. I have dozens of arguments at length to show that these railroad mail rates should be reduced at least 20 per cent. But I will not. It is no use. I will close my speech in a few minutes and then ask the permission of the Senate to put some additional matter in the RECORD.

I am going simply to say that I have proven by Poor's Railroad Manual that we pay forty-two times as much for mail as the average pay for freight; that we pay ten times as much for each pound of mail as the average charge for express; that we pay twice as much for mail as the passenger pays per pound, and we all know, except those who ride on free passes, that passenger rates are too high. How does the passenger rate in this country compare with other countries?

The average fare per mile is 2.034 cents in the United States and only 1.17 cents in Germany; 1.67 cents in Austria; 1.18 cents in Belgium; 1.29 cents in Denmark; 1.45 cents in France; 1.64 cents in Italy, and 1.45 cents in Russia. Our passenger rates are too high, yet we pay twice as much for carrying the mail.

Every particle of evidence given us by the Post-Office Department, from Postmaster-General Vilas to Postmaster-General Wanamaker, shows that there ought to have been a reduction of 20 per cent in these railway mail rates up to 1890.

Mr. President, I am in favor of an investigation. I would offer an amendment for 40 per cent reduction if there was no investigation under consideration. We ought to make this reduction of 20 per cent, because we know that eight years ago the Postmaster-General gave us the proof that there ought to be a reduction of that much, and then let the investigating committee investigate how much more the reduction ought to be.

The investigation will be a farce unless there is some man on it who is harder to satisfy than the men who agreed to the report of the Committee on Appropriations. The men who can accept those statements without doubting their correctness and without desiring to look further into them would be very easily satisfied, and in another investigation would accept just such statements from railroad attorneys, and probably make a report of the same purport to the Senate.

I have but little hope in an investigation. I have no faith in it unless there can be some men put on it who have some convictions about this matter other than those represented by the majority of the Appropriations Committee, because their prejudices all seem to be against going into this matter, but they accept such statements as have been made by railroad influences.

Mr. President, in conclusion I want to again call attention to the difference in what we pay for star-route and railroad service. I say to you here and now that if the men who carry the star-route mail were paid as well as the men who carry the railway mail we would vote more money for star-route service each year than we now vote or would vote for railroad service. We pay $5,000,000 for 265,598 miles of star-route service. Have we got that much railroad length? No. One hundred and seventy-three thousand, about two-thirds as much; and yet we pay six times as much—we pay over $30,000,000.

We pay only $5,000,000 for the star-route service, and the men who carry it do not get all of it. The middleman comes in; the speculator who bids off the contract. Probably not more than a million dollars is paid to the men who carry the mail over that distance. If those men were organized, if the star-route business of the country were in the hands of a syndicate that was organized, and if they were as wealthy as the railroad companies and could keep their hired lobby around here, if they could subsidize newspapers, if they could employ high-priced attorneys, then we would have a syndicate carrying the star-route service that would be getting twenty or twenty-five or thirty million dollars a year, and we would have documents here full of testimony to show how expensive it is to take the mail across the mountains 20 miles, how expensive it is to take the mail from a county seat and go around some 40 miles over sandy roads, dragging the mail with your horse and buggy, or your mules and wagon.

We would have eloquent speeches made here by Senators to show the labor and dead expense of distributing the mails as compared with the easy, sumptuous way of carrying it on railroads, when it costs nothing to the railroads, practically, to carry it. We know that the adding of one car to a train of cars is a very little expense. Practically it is the wear and tear of the car and a few bushels more of coal. That is all it costs to add another car on a train. Yet we are paying to-day for those cars more than they are worth in rent; we are paying twice as much, three times as much, ten times as much as would be a fair rent. So we should not consider the car. It is simply the weight. The weight is all that is to be considered, and we have shown that the weight is higher than any other weight that the railroads haul.

Mr. President, I shall ask permission to add an appendix to my speech. It is an article which I prepared some time ago. It was published in the March Arena. It relates to this subject to some extent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. President, in conclusion I will simply call attention to the fact that there is but one thing in issue. The Senators opposed to a reduction of rates have confessed, by proposing to investigate, that there ought to be a reduction. There has never been such a proposition to investigate except when an effort was made to make a reduction, and every time there is an effort to make a reduction there will be a proposition to investigate.

Investigations are very proper things in their places. There has been enough evidence put before the Senate, and uncontradicted—and I claim the credit myself for having put enough in during the time I have been talking and have given my authority for it—to show that a reduction of 20 per cent is only about half enough. If any Senators have any doubt about a 40 per cent reduction, they all know, unless they do not believe these facts—and I challenge any Senator to disprove them, unless he shows that my authorities are wrong—then the 20 per cent reduction is not half enough.

Therefore the most conservative Senator—but I do not know what is meant by a conservative. A man who is opposed to doing anything in the way of reform is usually called conservative.

Mr. HOAR. If my friend will allow me, I can give him a very good definition made by a New England man of a conservative. It is a Populist grown old and gone to seed.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Massachusetts says that a conservative is a Populist grown old and gone to seed. Whenever any special admirers of the Senator from Massachusetts wanted to praise him, when he has gotten up and made a speech which especially pleased them, they have said he is a "conservative man." When the newspapers in Massachusetts want to refer to him, and take his statements and publish them to uphold something they are advocating, they say the Senator is a "conservative man."

I suppose the Senator knows more about the value of Massachusetts authority, as it applies to him, than I do; but those are the facts. I do not know yet what is meant by a "conservative," unless the Senator has described himself; but whatever is meant, certainly there is enough evidence put here to convince the men who have been opposing a reduction if they are hunting for facts and are open to conviction.

Therefore, regardless of this proposition to investigate, I want to appeal to the "conservative Senators" to vote for a conservative proposition, which is to make a slight reduction, one which was recommended by the Postmaster-General in 1890, eight years ago, and leave the committee to investigate what greater reduction should be made on account of the fall in prices since 1890; and we all know that prices have fallen very much since 1890. That is conservative. So the position taken by the Senator from Pennsylvania that you ought to oppose this amendment because you are going to investigate is untenable. I would ask a reduction of 40 per cent if there was to be no investigation. Our arguments have all been based on that line and tended to show that a 40 per cent reduction is necessary.

The Senator says there is no idea of defeating this reduction by investigating. If not, then why wait another year? This investigating business is very expensive, and it costs us $12,000,000 a year too much to continue to pay these prices. We are paying $12,000,000 a year more than we ought to pay. Let us reduce it to six millions. Let us compromise and only pay six millions excess for the next year.

The New York World in a recent editorial said:

> The railroads of the United States are defrauding and overcharging the Government to the extent of $10,000,000 per annum, and this public plundering is going on while statesmen and debaters at Washington are vacantly going about for means whereby they may avoid a deficit of $3,000,000 per annum in running the Post-Office Department.

Mr. President, that is the testimony of all who investigate this question. It is too clear for controversy that a 20 per cent reduction is only about half enough.

APPENDIX.

TRUSTS—THE CAUSES THAT PRODUCE THEM—THE REMEDY.

By MARION BUTLER, in Arena for March, 1893.

Trusts are cancers—industrial cancers—on the body politic. They are eating cancers; they are spreading cancers; they are fatal to the prosperity and life of the Republic. Everybody admits this; everybody is opposed to trusts; yet trusts continue to thrive and prosper, and to multiply each day. Why is this? Because the voters have been deceived and misled about the causes that produce trusts and the true remedy to root them up and crush them out.

The last Republican legislature of New York appointed a committee to investigate trusts and report a bill to cure the evil. After many months of pretended investigation, the now famous Lexow antitrust committee made a long report denouncing trusts and declaring that they were the overshadowing evils of the age, yet closed by reporting that in the opinion of the committee the legislature was powerless to correct the evil, and that the only remedy lay in Congress.

In December, 1896, President Cleveland, in his last annual message to Congress, went out of his way to discuss the question of trusts. He warned the people against this growing menace to our industries and to our Government, but closed by saying that Congress was powerless to remove the evil, and that the remedy lay with the legislatures of the several States.

A few months later William McKinley was inaugurated President of the United States. In his inaugural address he arraigned and denounced trusts more severely even than his predecessor. He said that the life of the Republic demanded that this monster, this insidious and blighting curse, should be plucked from our industrial system. Yet he offered no remedy. He simply denounced the evil; nothing more.

One would judge from the language of Cleveland and McKinley that they were both honestly opposed to the causes that produce trusts; both of them are the apologists, supporters, and defenders of the fundamental evil agencies and conditions that inevitably produce and foster trusts. Indeed, it is well known that they were both nominated by the trusts, elected by the trusts, owned by the trusts, and therefore must serve the trusts.

A few years ago the Republicans passed an anti-trust law which they said would remedy the evil. It did not. The Democratic party denounced the Republican anti-trust law as a sham and a fraud and charged that the Republicans never intended to pass a law that would be effective. The Democratic party under the Cleveland régime came into power. The Cleveland Democrats proceeded to pass an anti-trust law of their own, which they claimed would remove and eradicate the evil.

It has not done so. To-day the Republican anti-trust law and the so-called Democratic anti-trust law are both on the statute book, side by side, and in full force. Yet trusts continue to grow and prosper and multiply in numbers as never before. What is the matter? The truth is that neither of these so-called anti-trust laws contains the true remedy. Neither of them is directed at the causes that produce trusts.

The so-called Democratic and Republican anti-trust laws now on the statute book are ineffective; first, because the evil laws now in existence and in full force, which inevitably produce trusts, are not repealed; next, because the so-called anti-trust laws are not directed at any of the fundamental conditions that foster and promote the existence of trusts.

A statute declaring that water shall not run downhill would be ineffective unless the statute should repeal the law of gravitation. To state it another way, the attempt to remove and cure the industrial cancers called trusts with the so-called anti-trust laws is as futile and foolish as it would be for a physician to attempt to heal a cancer growing out of blood poison by an application of salves. The only cure for such a cancer is a constitutional tonic that will remove the blood poison from the system.

Dr. Cleveland and Dr. Sherman have each been applying their anti-trust salves to the industrial cancers on the body politic for years, while the disease has increased and the patient has grown sicker with each application. To-day the whole nation is sick nigh unto death with a chronic and constitutional disease, the complication of trusts that infests our industrial system. These trusts can never be broken until the causes that produce trusts are removed.

What, then, are these causes?

First, we must see what a trust is. A trust is a scheme or a device to establish a complete monopoly of any line of business. Whenever any number of individuals organize themselves into a corporation and get a complete monopoly of any line of business, so that they can crush out all kinds of competition and regulate absolutely the price of not only the manufactured article sold to the public, but also the raw material bought from the producers to make the articles, then we have a typical modern trust.

But the all-important question is, How can any corporation get a complete monopoly of any line of business? That is, How is it possible for such a monopoly—such a trust—to be organized and maintained? Are not the thousands of people in a certain line of business more powerful than one syndicate or corporation in the same business? Are not 70,000,000 of people more powerful than a half dozen of that number? They are if they have equal opportunities.

Then, how is it possible for a very small number of men to drive out of business and crush their thousands of competitors, secure a complete monopoly, and maintain it in the face of the remainder of the nation? There is but one way in which it can possibly be done. The monopolists must first get control of the instruments of commerce. Those who control the instruments of commerce can, of course, control commerce itself, can destroy all competition, and can put any kind of business and every business into a trust at will.

Now, what are the instruments of commerce? They are three in number.

The first is money—the measure of values, the medium of exchange—which is the vital element in every business transaction. Money is the lifeblood of commerce, and business stagnates when the supply is cornered or when the quantity in circulation does not increase with the increase of population and business, just as the human body grows weak from congestion or loss of blood.

The second great instrument of commerce is transportation. Cheap transportation that can be used by all is an essential factor of business in any country, but the larger the country the more important is transportation. In a country of the immense distances of ours the transportation question is of equally vital importance with the money question.

But the opportunity and the right to use this instrument of commerce to transport products from one end of the country to the other at the same prices and on the same terms that your competitor pays or enjoys is of even more importance in preventing the building up of trusts than the question of cheapness. Whenever there is discrimination in freight rates, no matter whether the freight charges are high or low, a powerful leverage is given to those who have the benefit of rebates and favoritisms to crush out competition.

Do such discriminations exist? Yes; and necessarily so when a few great bankers and syndicates own and control this powerful instrument of commerce, and can therefore regulate rates and make discriminations in favor of monopolies and trusts with which they are allied. What do we see to-day? One man, J. Pierpont Morgan, representing a foreign gold syndicate composed of London Jews, owning and absolutely controlling, as the agent of that trust, eight of the biggest railroad systems in the nation. Which are they?

The New York, New Haven and Hartford, extending from New York to Boston and throughout New England; the Erie, with all its branches and feeders; the New York Central, extending from New York to Chicago, with all its ramifications; the Northern Pacific, extending from Chicago across the continent to the Pacific Ocean, with all its ramifications; the great Lehigh Valley system; the Big Four, covering the great fertile central West between St. Louis, Philadelphia, and Chicago; the Chesapeake and Ohio, running from Baltimore out to Chicago and the great Northwest; and the Southern Railway, extending from New York south to New Orleans, with all its ramifications in more than a dozen States.

These powerful systems, with the tributaries which they dominate and control, comprising more than 55,000 miles, govern every means of modern transportation in all the great, populous, and important sections of the nation from Chicago east and south, except the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Seaboard Air Line, and the Atlantic Coast Line.

Morgan and his gold backers have their greedy eyes on these—have them surrounded and cornered—and will press the button and gobble them up in their own sweet time. In short, this man Morgan, representing the cold-blooded shylocks, the descendants of the money changers whom Christ drove out of the temple, can to-day sit down around a table with six other railroad magnates, all of whom are already working in harmony and conjunction with the gold syndicate, and control absolutely every mile of railway in the nation.

By a stroke of the pen they can lock the wheels of every locomotive, they can put up rates or they can put them down, they can build up one section and tear down another, they can form partnerships with other industrial pirates, or they can organize trusts until there will not be an independent business left in the nation.

The third great and vital instrument of commerce is the transmission of intelligence. As far as the business world can use the Post-Office Department every one stands on a fair and equal footing; but the information that controls the markets and affects vitally the business world, from the Associated Press dispatches to the daily newspapers, the stock reports, and so on down, are transmitted by telegraph. The tremendous importance of this instrument of commerce is not generally realized.

The actions of men are controlled by their opinions; their opinions are formed on the information they receive. Therefore, the opinions and actions of the wisest and best men are sadly at fault if the truth has been kept from them or if it has been colored or perverted. Those who can control what we read can control our thoughts; those who control our thoughts can control our votes; those who can control our votes can control our pocketbooks and the destinies of the nation.

Here, then, are the three vital instruments of commerce—money, transportation, transmission of intelligence. How should they be used and by whom should they be controlled? Can agencies so powerful, and the proper use of which is absolutely essential to the welfare of all the people, be trusted in the hands of a part of the people to be used for their own private gain and power? Clearly not. Then, how should they be used and controlled in order to give equal opportunities to all and to promote the general welfare?

Clearly these instruments of commerce should be used as public functions at the lowest possible cost and without discrimination in favor of one person and against another. This must be done in order to put every industry and business enterprise on an equal footing. Has this been done? No. But instead, we have permitted the reverse to be done. These vital instruments of commerce are to-day completely in the hands of private individuals and speculators, who, therefore, have the business world at their mercy.

Whenever a government permits the instruments of commerce to go into private hands, it has surrendered its most important function of sovereignty. It has surrendered its power to "establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty." It is to secure these rights that governments are established among men.

The instruments of commerce are natural monopolies—they are natural trusts. When they are used as public carriers, open and free to the use of all on like terms and conditions, then there is healthy competition, with widespread industrial activity, and general prosperity and happiness. Under such just and happy conditions it is impossible for an industrial trust to be organized and maintained.

But when these natural monopolies, these natural trusts—the instruments of commerce—are controlled by private individuals and corporations for private gain and power, they become the parent trusts that produce general business stagnation in the midst of plenty and breed industrial trusts to absorb every line of business; and when such industrial trusts are organized and maintained they aggravate the conditions that gave them birth.

The causes that destroy business prosperity are the causes that produce trusts. A trust is the child of business stagnation and it feeds on hard times. Put into the hands of a few men the instruments of commerce that all men must use, and how can the remainder of mankind compete with them or do business at all except upon their terms—terms dictated by selfishness and greed?

In short, those who have a trust on money, a trust on transportation, and a trust on news have it in their power to levy tribute on every man and every industry in the nation in order to enrich themselves and their allies. They have other and, if possible, still more dangerous powers; they can use the instruments of commerce to extend princely favoritisms to some and to make deadly discriminations against others.

Thus, as I have said, they can build up one section of the country at the expense of another; they can build up one business and tear down every other business competing with it. By this selfish, greedy, and tyrannous use of such tremendous powers they have made millions of paupers to make a few millionaires; they have produced general business stagnation and widespread suffering in the midst of plenty. They have even taken charge of the Government itself.

They are the authors of the present hard times, and they are directly responsible for the organization of every trust. Was there a trust in existence before half of the people's money was destroyed by burning the greenbacks and demonetizing silver and the control of our finances was placed in the hands of a banking syndicate? Was there a trust in existence before the railroad and telegraph, the other two instruments of commerce, were monopolized by private greed?

During the thirty years in which a few private individuals, organized into corporations, have secured a trust on money, a trust on transportation, and a trust on intelligence there has sprung up, grown, and multiplied the aggregation of monster industrial trusts which are to-day blighting our industrial system and sapping the lifeblood of the Republic.

These facts are too plain for controversy. Here, then, we have the causes that produce trusts.

But what is the remedy? Clearly it is to remove these causes. Clearly it is to see that the instruments of commerce are wrested from the hands of private and corporate greed and operated as public functions for the public good.

And whose duty is it to take charge of and regulate these instruments of commerce for the public good? Clearly and unquestionably the duty of Congress. Section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, in enumerating the powers and duties of Congress, lays down as the third power and duty to be exercised the following:

"To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes."

Thus we see that every Congressman and Senator, when he takes the oath to support the Constitution, swears that he will use his vote to regulate commerce. But how can he use his vote to regulate commerce, or how can Congress, acting as a whole, regulate commerce without regulating the instruments of commerce? Does Congress regulate these instruments of commerce to-day? No. They are regulated by private persons and corporations in the interest of private and corporate greed.

Monopolists and corporations use the people's instruments of commerce as the most powerful agencies and weapons in the industrial system of the nation to oppress, tyrannize, intimidate, and rob every independent person and business enterprise. They bleed the country, make themselves millionaires and then use a part of their ill-gotten gains, their red-handed blood money, to control and dominate Congress itself.

It is true that Congress pretends to regulate these instruments of commerce, but the fact is that those who control the instruments of commerce control Congress, prevent the passage of effective laws to cure the evil, and secure the passage of other laws in their own interest which aggravate the evil. Congress made its fatal mistake when it put into the hands of private persons and syndicates these powerful, vital, and constitutional instruments of commerce, which make trusts, and make them greater than Congress.

In all our political campaigns the allied monopolists which have a trust on money, a trust on transportation, and a trust on intelligence combine. They select the conventions they will control, they elect the candidate they have selected. Of course they control them after they are elected. This has gone on until to-day these allied trusts control and dominate every branch of our Government.

What a terrible mistake Congress has made in surrendering to private greed such powerful weapons and indispensable public agencies for general business prosperity and the preservation of good government! If the commanding officer of an army should disarm his own soldiers, turn over his guns to the enemy, and then attempt to fight a battle, he would not act more foolishly or treacherously than Congress has done in failing to execute in behalf of the people its vested powers in a matter of such vital importance to the general welfare of the country and the life of the Government.

Can there be any excuse for this gigantic blunder perpetrated by Congress in the light of and in defiance of the teachings of all history since the dawn of civilization? Does not the experience of mankind, in every country and in every age since government was first organized, teach that whatsoever power has controlled the instruments of commerce—whether it has been a government or a combination of business interests—that power has always controlled commerce itself?

Yes. And the whole experience of mankind further teaches that whenever a government has failed to control the instruments of commerce, and has left their control to private interests, these private interests have not only controlled commerce but have also controlled and dominated the government.

This great danger was clearly seen by the founders of our Government when the Constitution was framed and adopted. When we read the debates in the constitutional convention, we find that those who opposed monarchical ideas and Hamiltonian theories declared undying opposition to all forms of monopoly.

They took the position that a natural monopoly should never be allowed to go into private hands; that a business which was a natural monopoly was a monopoly at birth, and that therefore no one could honestly claim to oppose monopolies if he favored putting such a business into private hands.

The result of that discussion and of the patriotic foresight of the founders of our Government was that every instrument of commerce as then existing was made a public function.

Did not the fathers declare undying opposition to banks of issue? Did they not provide that the Government should issue all money, the first great instrument of commerce?

The second instrument of commerce, transportation, at that time was the dirt roads—the king's highways—our lakes, rivers, and other navigable waters. Did not the fathers provide with jealous care that the rivers and other navigable waters should be public highways—should not be owned and controlled by private syndicates, but should be kept open and navigable at public expense and used on equal terms by everyone? Since that time inventive genius has made the steel rails supersede, as a vital instrument of commerce, the old cart and wagon ruts.

If it was important that the old dirt roads should be public highways, maintained at public expense for the public good, free to all alike, then is it not a hundredfold more important that this new, improved instrument of commerce, this modern means of transportation, shall be controlled, maintained, and operated in like manner?

Go read the debate over the proposition to establish a post-office system and operate it as a public function. Did not our fathers take the ground that this, being a natural monopoly, should never go into private hands, but should be operated by the Government as a public function for the public good?

Now, every argument that controlled our wise and patriotic forefathers in dealing with the instruments of commerce and providing against the birth and growth of monopolies and trusts at that time should control us to-day in dealing with the instruments of commerce in their present form—the mail system improved by electricity, the iron highways, and the circulating volume of money.

Take these great natural monopolies, which are the three vital instruments of commerce, from private hands and use them (as the fathers did) as public functions, and we remove at once the three most powerful and dangerous trusts—the trust on money, the trust on transportation, and the trust on news.

We do more. By removing the control of these natural monopolies, which in private hands are the parent trusts, we remove the causes that produce the aggregation of monster industrial trusts that to-day threaten the institutions of the Republic. Therefore, if we wish to deliver our Government and our industrial system from the deadly clutches of the monster trusts, we must hasten to retrace our steps, correct our mistakes, and boldly take the same action that the fathers did with reference to these great natural monopolies.

In short, our fatal error has been in departing from the doctrines of Jeffersonian Democracy. Apply to present conditions the principles of Jeffersonian Democracy and the constitutional remedy above pointed out, and we shall have the three greatest instruments of commerce—money, transportation, and the transmission of intelligence—in their modern form, operated as public functions at cost, without discrimination against any and with equal opportunities to all.

Thus the one vital, comprehensive, and paramount question confronting our people to-day is this: Shall we have a government by the foreign gold trust and its allied monopolies, which have captured our instruments of commerce, with the industrial trusts of which these are the parents—a government of the trusts, by the trusts, and for the trusts; or shall we, by reestablishing the principles of Jeffersonian Democracy, under which the instruments of commerce must be used as public functions, break the power of these industrial demons which are devouring us and reenthrone a government of the people, by the people, and for the people?

Let this be done, and then the causes that produce trusts will be removed; let this be done, and then every trust in existence will vanish as a fog before the rising sun. Let this be done, and then equal opportunities for every individual and every independent business enterprise will be restored; let this be done, and then, and not till then, will there be a permanent condition of general prosperity.

Mr. QUAY. There is unanimous consent to proceed to a final vote on this bill this afternoon, and therefore, unless there is some Senator ready to take the floor upon the amendment, I will move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. ALLEN. I hardly think this debate will be complete without a word from me.

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator from Nebraska is anxious to speak on the subject, I will withdraw the motion, of course; but I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I should be very glad to dispose of the bill to-day.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly. I shall not detain the Senate long.

I remember very distinctly, Mr. President, that Lord Campbell in his Lives of the Lord Chancellors, refers to a case in the early criminal jurisprudence of Great Britain, where a man was indicted, tried, and convicted of the crime of murder, committed with a certain blunt instrument called a "long speech?" I am not prepared to commit homicide this evening.

Mr. QUAY. We can not hear the language of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator will be able to read it in the morning. It is nothing personal.

Mr. President, years ago I took the position which has been taken by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], that we were paying out too much money to the railroad companies to carry the mail. I did not take that position in a spirit of anger at the railroad companies, because I have nothing to say against them when they conduct their business as they ought to do. I do not want to be classed among that class of men who are opposed to legitimate business enterprise. I do, however, want to be classed with that class of men who say that no corporation has any more right to live or to any greater voice in the Government than the humblest citizen, but that justice shall be done to all.

During this Congress, Mr. President, I introduced what I regarded as indisputable evidence of fraud in the Railway Mail Service. The evidence is in the RECORD now. I undertook to show, by what I regard as reliable authority, or at least worthy of investigation, that at that particular period of the year when mails are estimated by weight, or the contract is to be let by the average weight for a certain length of time—I forget how long——

Mr. CULLOM. For four years.

Mr. ALLEN. The average weight for a few months is taken on which to base a four years' contract——

Mr. CULLOM. Less than thirty days.

Mr. ALLEN. That annually this Government was defrauded out of not less than $9,000,000. If that is true, no man ought to desire to stifle any investigation. I am not prepared to say that any man is desirous of stifling investigation.

Mr. President, it is an old and trite saying that we are trustees of an express trust. No man occupying that relation of trust can ever acquit himself in his own conscience if he does not discharge that trust with absolute fidelity. I can understand how a man can suffer his own business to go to rack, because he alone suffers by it, but I can not understand how a man who is intrusted with the performance of high and delicate duties by those who are dependent upon him can permit their business to go to rack or ruin, and when his attention is called to the fact and he is appealed to to remedy the existing or prospective evil, that he will sit quietly by and fail or neglect to discharge his duty.

If there has been any fraud in the Railway Mail Service, it is no worse to charge them with fraud than it would be to charge you or me or any individual with fraud. If that evidence has been on record for months, as it has been, why has not an investigation been made? Why has not the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads taken judicial cognizance of what the record contains, taken up this subject and at least investigated it?

I do not know that it would be proper for me to arraign that committee for dereliction of duty, but nevertheless here stands out the bold, prominent, unconcealed, and unconcealable fact that frauds annually amounting to $9,000,000 exist without an investigation and without even the introduction of a resolution of condemnation. I said years ago, shortly after coming here, that these frauds do exist, and that indisputable evidence shows their existence.

Mr. President, is there anything in partisan politics which would induce a man to silently acquiesce in the consummation of such frauds? This is not a question of Republicanism or Democracy or Populism. It is a question of every man here keeping faith, not only with his own constituency, but with that larger constituency, the people of the United States.

I am frank to say that I am a little suspicious of commissions. Sometimes I have seen commissions appointed for no other purpose except that of delay, constant delay, that other peculations and other frauds might go on unrestrained while the commission was organizing itself and meeting and adjourning.

I was forcibly struck with the report made in this case. I am free to say, while I have not investigated this particular case with that care which some other Senators have, I was forcibly struck by the fact that the report is jughandled; it has but one side, and that is the side which wants the compensation of the railroads kept where it is. Did any man ever witness a contested litigation where it was constantly one-sided, all the evidence in favor of the prosecution or all in favor of the defense? There are two sides to this case. No man is intellectually big enough to deny that fact. There is the side represented by the beneficiaries of these contracts, whose agents are here from the opening to the closing of every session of Congress.

Sir, they have large sums of money involved in these contracts, and they are here with the most skillful agents and the most skillful lawyers; and who represents the other side? Who represents the man in business or the man on the farm or the man who toils? The member of Congress, whether he be a Senator or Representative; and, Mr. President, without intending to be disrespectful to any person, if you were sailing your ships across the ocean [Mr. PERKINS in the chair] and I was cultivating my farm in Nebraska, and we could know that our interests as taxpayers were being so cheerfully looked after in Congress as they seem to be now, would we not delight that we were represented by our particular Senator or Representative? Would we not have the glorious assurance that our interests as citizens of the United States would be most painstakingly cared for? Yet here is a report one-sided.

Why was not some other person summoned before the committee to give his evidence? Do you tell me that these agents are the only men who know anything about this question? Some gentlemen seem to think so; and what a monopoly this monopoly of knowledge is. It is only given to a few, a very few, and those interested in the money to come from the contracts, to know what the Government ought to do respecting the carrying of the railway mails. All the balance of the 75,000,000 people on the other side of that contract, who pay these tremendous sums of money from their toil and their sweat annually, all these are ignored—not one of them summoned.

I suppose it would be regarded as almost disgraceful if a man thinking as I do should ask the committee to send out to Nebraska or to some of the other States and summon a farmer to give his evidence. What does the farmer know about it? Mr. President, this country is the country of the farmer as much as it is yours, and it is absolute insolence, if it is not a betrayal of a lack of ordinary breeding, to make a remark against the interest of the farmer or his right to appear in Congress.

Mr. President, the statistician was right who, when an individual applied to him for statistics on a certain question—and I have thought very frequently that illustrates these reports; it certainly illustrates the report of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] in this case—said: "On what side do you want these statistics? Just tell me the side on which you want the statistics and I will furnish them to you before morning." So it is with the Committee on Appropriations—on which side do you want the evidence, in support of the contract or in denial of it, or in the interests of justice? It seems that the railway companies want the statistics in this case.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, unless the Senator from South Dakota desires to proceed, I will submit a motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to take the floor, but not for long.

Mr. QUAY. Then I will not make the motion I was about to make.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It seems to me, however, that we might have a direct vote upon the proposition itself when we do vote, instead of a motion to lay it upon the table.

Mr. QUAY. It is a matter of no consequence. If there is to be no more discussion, and the Senator will let us conclude the bill, I shall not make the motion.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, in the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] he called attention to some tables of the weight of mail, and the compensation paid for carrying the same, in my remarks of last Friday. The figures I gave in regard to the weight of the mail were furnished me by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and I supposed they embraced all the mail which was put into the post-offices, and made my computations accordingly. It is now stated that in those tables the franked matter, sent by members of the two Houses and by officers of the Government, was not included. On page 135 of the evidence given by the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service is this statement:

> It may be well to state here that the weight of the equipment represents about 9.54 per cent of the whole weight, as is shown in the statement made some time ago that the number of pounds of mail mailed annually is about 528,389,009.

The tables which the Department have furnished me, at my request, and the statements in the evidence of the officials of the Department led me to believe that the weight of the mail had been correctly stated by them. On page 136 of the testimony the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service says:

> During the year ended June 30, 1897, there was mailed in the United States about 528,389,009 pounds of mail matter, divided as follows.

Who would suppose that there was any error, all of this information coming from the authorities of the Government and from people who ought to know? However, Mr. President, if the table of figures does not embrace the free matter, which I understand amounts to fifty-three or fifty-four million pounds, still the computation I have made is practically correct, for this reason: I have taken 528,000,000 pounds and deducted nothing for the mail which is carried by the star routes, for which we are paying $5,000,000 a year, for the mail that is carried by steamboats, and for the mail distributed through the cities, which never sees a railroad, and I believe all these exceptions will equal the franked matter. Therefore my figures are practically correct.

The report of the majority of the Committee on Appropriations is rather a peculiar document. Its wonders are disclosed the more it is examined. In the first place, we have the testimony of a swarm, a cloud, of railroad attorneys, who appeared before the committee and submitted their statements. Then we have the statements of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and his assistants, and their statements are practically a reiteration of what the railroad attorneys have told us. Almost every statement they make is simply a repetition of that which the representatives of the railroad companies gave to our committee. I would like to have any Senator examine this testimony in order to see how completely my assertion is corroborated in almost every line of the report of the majority of the committee.

By the way, I am going to comment a little with regard to the character of the evidence submitted by the representatives of the railroad companies. I doubt the validity or value of the statements made by those gentlemen, and I have good reason to doubt it, not that they committed perjury, for we did not swear them; not, perhaps, that they committed an absolute and direct falsehood, but they are so ingenious and so skilled that by weaving a web of complicated statements, by the use of professional terms, they can draw conclusions and make statements which are not true in such a manner as to render it almost impossible to detect their purpose. If we put them on the witness stand and swear them, do we get the facts? Let us see what the Interstate Commerce Commission says about this matter in their last annual report. They go on to say, in their annual report, page 47, that they believe there were discriminations and that there was not a maintenance of rates between New York and Chicago. Therefore they determined to make an investigation.

> It is my only purpose to observe here, in reference to that inquiry, that it was participated in by the several members of the commission in person; that those officers of the different railroad companies engaging in that traffic, who must have known it if the rate had been departed from, were called before us and compelled to give evidence under oath. That evidence was, without exception, that the rate had been in all cases maintained.

Now, let us see what they say about it:

> These gentlemen must have known whereof they spoke. Their testimony covers a period in which rates of the kind involved were said to have been more than ordinarily disturbed, and that testimony shows that during all that time and in reference to all those shipments the published tariff was scrupulously exacted. Nevertheless, there are strong reasons for believing that the fact is otherwise. Those who are in a position to know say that this is so. Railroad managers themselves, with one accord, declare it to be so. Facts which are morally convincing, although not of a character to secure a legal conviction, lead to the same opinion. We have no doubt that at the present time very large quantities of competitive traffic are carried at other than published rates. * * * When those who have knowledge of what is actually done are put upon the witness stand they refuse to disclose the truth.

Here is a deliberate opinion, signed by every member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, delicately stated, saying that these men came before them and without exception, under oath, swore positively that they had scrupulously maintained the rate.

What do they think of each other? Mr. Ingalls, president of the Chesapeake and Ohio and also the Big Four road, published an article in the Engineering Magazine of July, 1896, and this is the language he uses in regard to his associates in the business:

> Before the passage of the interstate-commerce act many of them had been insolent and lawless. For a little while they obeyed the law of 1887, but by 1895 they had become worse than ever. If the railway business of this country is to be conducted in the future as it was to an alarming extent for, we will say, the two years ending June 30, 1895, those of us engaged in this profession would lose the respect of ourselves and of our fellow-citizens, and deservedly so.

These I know are strong words and harsh ones, but they are true.

If I accomplish nothing more than to call the attention of the country to the majority report and its peculiar evidence, the peculiar method of the men who put it in, I will make progress in this fight, and in the end will secure a reduction of pay for carrying the mails. Based on this evidence, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General tells us what. He says:

> That, in the presence of this committee, would be my conclusion, very clearly stated. I have not so stated it to any one of the companies—

He seems to think he kept a great secret from the companies as to how he stood on this question—

> but, in the presence of this committee, I can state emphatically that I have been surprised to find that the rates allowed under the operation of the present law were less, proportionately, in my judgment, considering cost of service, than the rates of compensation allowed them by express companies or passenger traffic, and in some instances by high-class freight. I affirm that we are getting mail carried in some instances lower than the high-class freight on the same line.

No wonder he could come to that conclusion, for he had absolutely studied no evidence other than the statements of the representatives of the railroad companies. Very briefly I propose to show what are the rates for carrying freight. We pay for carrying the mail nearly 6 cents a pound—5¼ cents. I will print with my remarks a letter from the Interstate Commerce Commission which demonstrates that the rate for carrying freight has decreased since 1882 from 1.23 cents per ton per mile to eight-tenths of a cent per ton per mile—that is, for all classes of freight—while we pay for carrying the mail per ton per mile 6 cents, where the transportation exceeds 300,000 pounds per day and $1.17 per ton per mile where the amount is 200 pounds or less per day. Yet he asserts that the transportation for mail is less than for high-class freight.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Office of the Secretary, Washington, April 6, 1898.

DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of your favor of the 3d instant requesting a statement of the average decline in freight and passenger rates in this country since 1878. I regret that I am unable to find any publication giving any information upon the subject prior to 1882. The accompanying statement, prepared by the auditor of the commission, is taken from Poor's Manual for the years 1882 to 1887, and compiled from commission's reports since that time. It is believed that the information you desire is best shown by the average rate per ton per mile on freight and the average rate per passenger per mile, which appears in the statement.

Sincerely, yours,
EDW. A. MOSELEY,
Secretary.

Hon. R. F. PETTIGREW,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Auditor's Office, April 5, 1898.

Statement showing the average rate per ton per mile on freight and the average rate per passenger per mile from 1882 to 1896, inclusive.

Year.	Freight, average rate (in cents) per ton per mile.	Passenger, average rate (in cents) per passenger per mile.
1882	1.236	2.447
1883	1.224	2.422
1884	1.125	2.266
1885	1.036	2.198
1886	1.042	2.194
1887	1.034	2.276
1888	1.001	2.349
1889	.922	2.165
1890	.941	2.167
1891	.895	2.142
1892	.893	2.126
1893	.878	2.108
1894	.890	1.986
1895	.839	2.040
1896	.806	2.019

Let us look further in regard to that matter. The Texas Pacific and Southern Pacific carried caps, boots, cashmeres, and hardware from New Orleans to San Francisco for eight-tenths of a cent per pound, and the distance, instead of being 1,500 miles, as I stated this morning, is 2,489 miles, while we pay for carrying the mail from New York to Chicago, a distance of about 900 miles, according to the statement of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, $4.33 a hundred, or four cents and a third a pound. It appears that the railroad carries the mail a little over 900 miles for 4⅓ cents per pound, while the Southern Pacific carries first-class freight 2,489 miles for eight-tenths of a cent per pound; and yet the Second Assistant Postmaster-General comes in here—and his statement is accepted by the committee—and says that they carry the mail as cheaply as they carry freight.

There is no end to the evidence on this proposition. It is too absurd to be talked about. He says the mail is carried for less, in some instances, than is the express matter. Therefore I propose to go over that question again. The express companies in this country, in 1890, according to the census, shipped 3,292,000,000 pounds of express which they weighed, and 17,000,000 packages of express which they did not weigh. Dividing the amount of money they paid the railroads—which was $19,327,000—by the number of pounds of express matter which they did weigh, we find they paid five and about seven-ninths mills per pound for carrying the express, while the Government paid 5¼ cents per pound for carrying the mail, or ten times as much; and we have thrown into this calculation the 17,000,000 packages of express, which cover the valuable goods, that they did not weigh at all. So the absurdity and ridiculousness of the assertion of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General is absolutely obvious. It can not be truthfully contradicted. I will publish as a part of my remarks, copied from the Census of 1890, a statement of the express business of the country:

EXPRESS, CENSUS 1890.

Number of freight waybills		44,475,000
Packages carried, not valuable		98,118,000
Weight of same	pounds	3,292,000,000
Number valuable waybills		11,614,000
Number packages		17,258,000
Number money orders		4,398,000
Total		6,992,000
Paid to railroads		$19,327,000
Paid to water lines		173,000
Paid to stage lines		60,000
Employees		16,176,000
Local expenses and repairs		3,500,000
General expenses		828,000
Other expenses		2,299,000
Total		42,411,000

Cost per pound railroad transportation, 5⅛ mills; cost per package, 16½ cents; weight per package, 28 pounds.

One more point. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General says that the basis for computation and comparison is the carriage of passengers; that the railronds carry mail for less than they carry passengers. That is not a basis of comparison. It seems absurd upon its face that we should stop to talk about comparing the cost of carrying live persons, human beings, with the cost of carrying the mail. Yet he presents that absurd proposition and proceeds to calculate that a car carries thirty people, that the rate is 2 cents a mile, and therefore they get 60 cents for hauling a passenger car, and that the Government pays about 26 cents for hauling the mail car. But, Mr. President, he bases his calculation upon the proposition that each passenger car carries thirty people. What are the facts? If you will look on page 61 of the Statistics of the Railroads of the United States, issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission of 1896, you will find that the average train load of passengers in the United States is thirty-nine, and with five cars to the train it would be less than eight passengers to a car. It is because of such evidence as that, presented to us by our officials, that I attack their statements. To make propositions of that sort invites attack. They have earned severe criticism.

In computing the compensation for the transportation of the mails and for the service of the postal cars the Second Assistant Postmaster-General takes the rate per ton per mile where the weight carried is over 300,000 pounds a day. He says that it is 6.06 cents per ton per mile. He says of the twenty-five hundred and some odd roads over which the mails are carried there are only 255 which use postal cars, because only that number carry more than 5,000 pounds a day. Now, let us see what his computation is for 5,000 pounds a day. Where the transportation of mail amounts to only 5,000 pounds a day we pay 18.73 cents per ton per mile, and yet in making this computation to compare the mail service with the passenger service he takes the smallest possible sum, and for my part I would not vouch for his figures at that. I believe it is higher where the larger sum is involved. How can we compare the passenger service with the mail service under these circumstances? Where the railroad carries but 200 pounds per day we pay $1.17 a ton a mile, and yet when he makes his figures to compare the cost of carrying the mail and passengers he takes the figure of 6.06 cents per ton per mile to make the comparison. It is simply ridiculous.

He takes the Pennsylvania Railroad and one of its cars. He says nothing about the weight of the sleeping cars that are carried as an adjunct to the passenger business, about the baggage car that is carried as an adjunct, or the dining car. He simply takes one car and says that carries thirty people and that it earns so much. And yet he presents that to us, a legislative body, as a fact upon which to base our conclusion, and then his friends complain because I attack him as the representative of the railroads.

He does worse than that. He takes a Pennsylvania car, one passenger car, instead of taking the average for the whole country, and then he employs the average of the weight of mail carried in a single mail car of the whole country with which to make the comparison. The weight in a mail car varies. In a thinly settled country the weight may be 4,000 pounds, and where traffic is heavy, like that on the Pennsylvania road, he says it may run up to 12,000. In making this comparison, however, he uses the average for the whole country and compares it with a passenger car on the Pennsylvania road, where the traffic is the heaviest, for carrying the mail, and therefore his comparison ought to have been between the 12,000 pounds of mail on the car and the passenger car. Then his figures would have been overturned. So there has been presented to us all this web of confusing figures, half falsehoods, foolish comparisons, and that is assigned by the report of the majority of the committee as the reason why we should maintain these rates.

I assert that we are paying, from the best data I can get—and if my data is not correct, why do not the railroad companies show that it is not true? They are in possession of all the facts. I have done my best to get at them, but neither the express companies nor the railroad companies will furnish information. If it is not true, why do they not furnish the facts? From the very best information I can get, we are paying ten times as much for carrying the mails as the express companies are paying for having their express matter carried. It is carried on the same train, and when we put on an exclusive mail train they carry express matter on that train also, according to the testimony of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. So with both mail and express carried on the same train, with almost identically the same service——

Mr. GEAR. Will the Senator permit me? They carry only through express on the mail trains, not way express. They do not deliver any way express.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator probably knows what he is talking about, but we have not got that in evidence. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General said, when we asked the question if the mail trains which were put on carried express: "Oh, yes; they carry express also." What more did he say? When he was asked if we paid extra for these special trains for mail he said, "No;" that the railroad company would come and say, "If you will not make us carry mail on two or three trains, we will put on one special mail train." Then they carry express also. Here are two services, one paid for by the express company, one paid for by the United States, nearly identical, on the same train, having, so far as the weight of the mail is concerned, about the same facilities, and the Government pays ten times as much as the express companies pay. We pay ten millions where they pay one.

Now, of course there is a difference in the service when it comes to the use of these distributing cars, but that is not the subject I am talking about. I am talking about the $30,500,000 paid for carrying the mail. In addition we pay four millions for the use of these cars, and that is the extra facility which we get over and above facilities furnished the express companies. Making the calculation upon the amount paid for carrying the mail by weight, leaving out the special facilities furnished by the postal cars, we pay ten times more than the express companies pay. Senators can vote for it if they want to; I will not. A reduction of one-fifth of $6,000,000 is too small. We tried to get the investigation a year ago. The Committee on Appropriations brought in a proposition to investigate. It was attacked upon the floor, and, without a vote, was surrendered. I am sorry to say I was absent. If I had been here, we would have had a vote.

We have waited a year. Nobody looks into this matter at all. It goes on. We call the railroad representatives before us, and we call the Second Assistant Postmaster-General before us, and he gives us what the railroads have already given us. He draws these absurd and ridiculous conclusions, and we are asked to investigate again without a reduction. Mr. President, if we wish to practice economy, here is a chance to save $6,000,000. Some Senator asked the Second Assistant Postmaster-General if that would result in abandoning the service. He said, "Oh, the railroads will probably go on carrying the mail and trust to Congress in the future to right the wrong." If there is a wrong, it is apparent to any fair-minded man who has investigated this question that the wrong is against the people of the United States. The wrong is that this thing has gone on.

Postmaster-General Vilas called attention to it. Postmaster-General Wanamaker called attention to it. Still it went on. When, finally, it becomes too hot, it is proposed to investigate. Now, I am willing to investigate, but in the meantime I want to save the six millions and spend the money in maintaining the honor of the country.

It is a matter of sincere regret to me to be obliged to criticise a great Department of this Government. It is a matter of regret to me that on their statements I am obliged to impeach their honesty of purpose. I regret to do it. I am forced to do it upon their own statements. I am forced to do it from the manner in which they have presented this question, and I am sorry for it. I hope the time will come when it need never be done again. I hope the time has come when it never will become necessary.

But how are we to correct these abuses? Somebody must attack them. It is not pleasant work. There is no fun in it. But if we never attack them they will go on forever. The time was, although contrary to law, only a few years ago, when we paid over $900,000 for special facilities not provided in postal cars. The railroads took it. The Department paid it to them in absolute violation of the statute. When, after the abuse had run along for years and years, the Postmaster-General discovered it, of course he stopped it. The railroads carried their own mail first class. The rate of the Government was nearly a dollar a pound, which was enormously profitable.

Anybody else would be guilty of a criminal offense if he carried the mail. But they were allowed to carry their own. What did they do? In spite of this great donation, this enormous sum we were paying, for years they carried not only their own mail but the mail of other railroads, and finally they began to carry the mail of other people. Then it was corrected. I do not know that it was corrected. I know the Postmaster-General called attention to it, and I suppose they corrected it, and he called attention to the fact that it was impossible to convict these people, and he asked for additional legislation in order to be able to do it.

Now, as I said before, Mr. President, this is no pleasure; but here is an abuse so enormous in its proportions that it is time something was done about it. If I am wrong in my figures and calculations, I have done the best I could from all the information I could get, and I could have got all the information I wanted if the people whom I attack would furnish it to me, and that makes me additionally suspicious, until I do not place much credit upon their statements. But, taking their statements, taking their testimony, taking what they have furnished us, they have convicted themselves.

I ask unanimous consent to publish as a part of my remarks a paper prepared by James L. Cowles, of Farmington, Conn., author of a book entitled General Freight and Passenger Post. This paper is a valuable contribution to this debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to printing the paper in the RECORD? The Chairs hears none, and it is so ordered.

The paper referred to is as follows:

RAILWAY MAIL PAY, THE EXPRESS COMPANIES, AND THE POST-OFFICE.

According to the testimony of the distinguished gentlemen who represented the principal railroads of the country at the hearing on "railway-mail pay" before the subcommittee of the Senate on the 18th of April, 1898, the book, A General Freight and Passenger Post, written by James Lewis Cowles, is a particularly objectionable publication. In the first place, it is the particular arsenal whence have come the weapons used in the recent Congressional attacks upon the government of the united railways. In the second place, it adopts the suggestion of the Hon. George R. Blanchard, of the Joint Traffic Association, and proposes that the business of public transportation be transferred from the united railway government to the United States Government. In the third place, it follows the suggestions of several other distinguished railway authorities, and proposes that railway rates shall be determined on the postal principle, and that on low-class freight the rates on ordinary trains shall not be over $5 a carload of 30 tons, or, it may be, of 50 tons, for any distance within the railroad system of the United States. Another objectionable feature of the book is its proposition that the Government of the United States shall follow the suggestion of the Hon. Chauncey M. Depew and form a general money pool (a pool including the receipts from the use of all the railways), from which there shall be transferred to the treasuries of the stronger and the weaker lines alike sufficient moneys to insure their support, to each according to its necessities, just as it now transfers money from the present postal pool for the support of the different post-offices.

"From this source has emanated, as I believe," says W. W. Baldwin, of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road, "the fable that the railroads are receiving 8 cents a pound for carrying the mails, and the equally erroneous assertion that express companies are performing a similar service for 1 cent a pound."

Now, I would correct this statement of Mr. Baldwin. The source of this fable, if it be a fable, that the government of the united railways taxes the Government of the United States 8 cents a pound and express companies not 1 cent, but four-tenths of a cent a pound for a similar service, is back of this book. It is derived from the statements of the Post-Office Department of the United States and of such gentlemen as the Hon. Mr. LOUD, of California, chairman of the Post-Office Committee, and from the acts of the express companies, and from the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Postmaster-General Gary, in his report of 1897, page 7, says that "the cost to the Government of transmitting the 365,000,000 pounds of second-class matter carried during the past fiscal year is estimated at $29,000,000; the postal revenue received from it is estimated at $3,000,000, leaving a loss, on transportation alone, of $26,000,000." This makes the transport tax only a trifle under 8 cents a pound.

The total weight of all the matter passing through the United States mails in the fiscal year 1896 was about 807,000,000 pounds. The railway mail pay for that year was over $32,000,000. If every ounce of this postal matter had been handled by the railroads, their compensation would have averaged over 5 cents a pound. But a very large amount of mail matter never goes on a railroad. A large part of our postal business is merely local business; another part of it is carried on the star service and steamboat routes.

I think it a perfectly safe deduction from the reports of the Post-Office Department that the average tax levied upon the Government of the United States by the government of the united railways for their share in the transportation of mail matter is about 8 cents a pound. And this does not conflict with the statements of Mr. Baldwin that on such short hauls as from New York to Philadelphia, 90 miles, the tax is as low as 26 cents a hundred pounds, or that on some 200-mile hauls the rate is 26 cents a hundred. These statements may be altogether correct, but it may also be true that in other cases this railroad tax may be as high as the steamer rates across the Atlantic—for all steamers carrying the American flag, but not under contract, $1.60 a pound, $3,200 a short ton on letters and post cards, and 8 cents a pound on other articles, or as high as was paid the American (Standard Oil?) Line, New York to Southampton, during the year ending June 30, 1896, $757,228 for a total of 1,923,985 pounds, or nearly 40 cents a pound. (See page 365, Post-Office Report, 1897; also pages 12 and 29 of Senate document of April 18-19, 1898, on Railway Mail Pay.)

It is a curious fact that if the result of the war with Spain were to transfer all our foreign mails to foreign ships, there would be an annual saving to the Post-Office at present rates of over $1,000,000. This American steamer tax on the Post-Office would seem to be even more unjust than is the railway-mail pay.

One thing is certain: Taking the figures of the Post-Office Department to be reliable as to the weight of mail matter, even if the railroads handle every ounce that goes into the mails, their average compensation is over 5 cents a pound, and this tax is full ten times the tax which the railroads levy on the express companies for similar services—four-tenths of a cent a pound—and more than ten times what the service would cost the people if our royal-ralled highways were under the control of the Government.

We find, moreover, that although the Government contracts with the railroads cover the transportation of all classes of mail matter, and although on occasion, as in the case of the quadrennial weighing on the Seaboard Air Line in 1896, second-class matter is freely used to pad the mails, notwithstanding these facts the railroads, either directly or through the agency of express companies, deprive the Government of its legitimate revenues on short hauls and on business actually paid for, and we also find that our express companies have of late instituted an attack on another profitable branch of the postal business, namely, the transportation of valuables. Neither have we forgotten the discovery made during the régime of Postmaster-General Wilson, that the railroads were accustomed not only to pay no postage on their own mail matter transported over their own lines, but also to carry one another's mails without making any return therefor to the Government. (Page 61 of that objectionable book, A General Freight and Passenger Post.)

Postmaster-General Wanamaker made the average haul of mail matter about 442 miles. Other postal experts have made it, I believe, 448 miles. Congressman LOUD, chairman of the House Committee on Postal Affairs, says that "within a radius of 200 miles (within zones of 500 miles) the express companies carry the matter—second-class matter, for the transportation of which the railroads are paid by the Government, and the revenues from which belong to the Government: matter on which, as we have seen in the case of the Seaboard Air Line, their quadrennial contracts are very largely based—the express companies carry this matter under zones of 500 miles for a fraction under 1 cent a pound; beyond 500 miles they dump it on the United States Government for transportation."

On page 241 of the third edition of Cowles's General Freight and Passenger Post there is cited the case of the meeting of the Mississippi Valley Medical Association in October, 1897, on which occasion the express companies took this business from the Post-Office—the express companies perform their service from door to door—within a zone which covered well-nigh half the continent. I repeat that every cent which the express companies get from this business belongs to the Post-Office, and the business is paid for by the Postal Department under its quadrennial contracts.

Our railway friends will perhaps explain the following dilemma: Either the Government pays the entire bill for this short-haul second-class service and the express companies take to themselves the entire revenues, clear from all expenses, or the railroads are paid twice, once by the Government and once by the express companies, for the same service, and the express companies enjoy the profits which rightfully belong to the Government. In any case, the railroad tax on the express companies is so small that they are able to carry the matter not only from station to station within zones of 500 miles, but to collect and deliver the same from the door of the consignee to the door of the consignor, and all for a fraction under 1 cent a pound.

That under the present mileage system for determining railway-mail pay this short haul second-class business would be immensely profitable to the Government, provided they were protected in securing their legitimate revenues, is clearly proved by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General on pages 184–185 of the postal report of 1897.

Although on page 7 of this report Postmaster-General Gary says that on the 365,000,000 pounds of second-class matter carried in the mails during the past fiscal year there was a loss from transportation alone of $26,000,000 (nearly 8 cents a pound, less the 1 cent received for the service), a net loss of about 7 cents a pound due to transportation. His Second Assistant tells us that if the Government was secured in collecting its legitimate revenues from the second-class matter carried on the Sunday morning train from New York to Washington the net profits from the business on this one train would be from $15,000 to $20,000 annually.

"This train was successfully run as a mail train October 10, 1897. The newspaper mail alone taken on at New York was 75,442 pounds, and at Philadelphia 11,368 pounds; in all, 86,810 pounds, yielding to the Department, at 1 cent a pound, a revenue of $868.10."

At this rate the gross revenue to the Government from the second-class matter carried on this one train in the course of the fifty-two Sundays in a year would be $45,141.20, and these figures represent the amount that is now diverted from the Government either to the express companies or is shared between the railroads and the express companies.

If no reduction be made in railway-mail pay, then surely Congress will hear the prayer of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and will enact such legislation as may be needed to secure the Government in its legitimate revenues. Under such legislation rigidly enforced this short-haul second-class business for the transportation of which Mr. Baldwin says the Government pays 26 cents a hundred for the haul New York to Philadelphia and 58 cents for hauls of 200 miles—under such legislation this short-haul business would increase so enormously as to very probably bring down the average mail pay to less than 1 cent for the average haul and to make the 1-cent-a-pound rate paid by publishers and news dealers a source of large profit to the Government.

It is profitable now to the express companies within zones of 500 miles at a fraction under 1 cent a pound or they would not do the business. We have seen the enormous profits of this business on the Sunday morning mail train New York to Washington. And if this business is profitable to the express companies on the comparatively small scale to which it is confined by the restrictions of the cent-a-pound rate to publishers and news dealers, it will be indefinitely more profitable to the Government when the whole business is brought into the hands of the Government and when it is carried on upon such a scale as would follow the extension of the cent-a-pound rate to the general public and to general merchandise. With the legislation necessary to secure this end, not only would the present deficiency in the postal revenues disappear, but it is probable that even with the present mail pay there would be a considerable net revenue from the Post-Office.

It is on these lines that we must act if our people are to be enabled to easily bear the burdens imposed upon us by our war with Spain. We have entered upon this war out of sympathy for the Cuban reconcentrados. We have our American reconcentrados, and we have our American Weylers as well, and every now and then these American Weylers show their hands. And nowhere have their attacks on American liberty been more insidious than in their assaults on the service of the Post-Office. Their latest onslaught of this character is thus described by the New York Evening Post of April 8, 1898, under the head of "Insurance of mail matter:"

"The insurance department of Indiana has been asked by an express company to prohibit the insurance of valuables sent by mail. This action is in line with that which succeeded in this State (New York) three months ago, when Superintendent Payn, at the request of several express companies, refused to renew the licenses of three foreign insurance companies unless they ceased interfering with the express business. The position of the superintendent was objected to by the insurance companies at the time, but without avail, and to save their other business two of them gave the required stipulation and one withdrew from the State. The effort has not succeeded as yet in Indiana, the authorities saying that since the law is silent upon the subject they are not disposed to interfere. A bill prohibiting the business will probably come before the next legislature of the State, when a prolonged struggle between the opposing interests is expected. The controversy brings up some interesting questions and will be watched with interest by insurance men everywhere."

I would respectfully suggest that this is a business for the consideration of others than expressmen or of insurance men. It is a matter to be dealt with by the common people, who elect legislatures. This government by private corporations for the benefit of private corporations at the expense of the common people of this country must cease. The American people will not much longer allow their movements and the movements of their produce to be controlled by private railroad managers and their express agents.

The reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of Poor's Manual, combined with the oft-repeated statements of such men as Edward Atkinson, have caused the public to believe that within recent years our royal railway government has largely loosened the chains of its American slaves, or, in other words, that there has been a very great reduction in railway tariffs, and this supposed reduction of general railway rates has in some cases been made the basis of a demand for the reduction of railway-mail pay.

The ordinary man, however, is, as a rule, tied quite as closely to his home to-day as he has been for many years. That this is true as to his own movements is clearly proved on page 40 of the book, A General Freight and Passenger Post. Many cases are also noted where freight rates have even been largely increased, and this in spite of a great decrease in the cost of the service rendered. Only the other day Congressman LITTLE, in the course of a speech on the transportation of Indian supplies, stated that the tax levied by the railroads on the Government for the transport of these supplies from New York to points in Arizona is one-third higher this year than it was last year. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-fifth Congress, page 997.) And now, on pages 70 to 72 of this interesting Senate document on Railway Mail Pay, we find the testimony of the officials of the Louisville and Nashville road to the effect that there has been no decrease in the railway-transport tax on freight for many years except in the case of long-haul and low-grade traffic, or, in other words, except in traffic which is chiefly in the hands of great speculators like the Leiters and the Armours.

And this testimony is in perfect harmony with the accusation made against some of the Western railroad managers by President Stickney before the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1896:

"You charge the Kansas and Nebraska farmer 13 cents to haul his grain 200 miles. You charge the grain dealer 6 cents to haul that grain twice as far—to Chicago."

And these Louisville and Nashville officials back up their evidence with the following printed tariff tables:

We have also the statement of Mr. Slater, the representative of the great trunk lines, that as to passenger rates there has been no decrease since 1873. (See page 32, Railway Mail Pay.) And as to cost per passenger mile on the Pennsylvania Railroad, he figures it up as follows:

	Cents.
1876	1.055
1880	1.406

Which, being interpreted, means that the men who live along the Pennsylvania's lines are practically tied, each man to the disadvantages of his native heath, while the railroad trains are run with less than one-tenth of their capacity occupied. The transport taxes on this road, full 50 cents for a round trip to a job 10 miles from his home, 50 per cent and more of the earnings of a Pennsylvania anthracite coal miner—these taxes on the movements of the people of Pennsylvania are so high that the ordinary man can not travel. In hard times the only thing left for him to do is to starve or to join a strike and be shot. It was this policy of not allowing the people for whom the railroad was built to use the road that led to the fearful riots in Pittsburg in 1877. It was the continuance of this railroad policy that led to the riots and to what some people are wont to call the murders in the anthracite-coal regions of Pennsylvania in 1897.

On one of the railroad lines about 10 miles out of the city of Philadelphia is a plot of 12 acres of most fertile land that has been offered to the free cultivation of a certain charity organization of the city. The cultivation of vacant city lots on the Pingree plan in Philadelphia resulted last year in enabling a family to get from a quarter-acre lot enough vegetables to last them all winter, in addition to a considerable sum of money. The cultivation of this 12-acre lot would furnish a similar opportunity to forty-eight city families. This land, however, is destined to lie idle while these families go idle in summer and starve in winter because, forsooth, the railroad company so orders it, and meanwhile its trains run with hardly as many passengers as a good mule could haul on a railway.

I repeat, we have gone to war with Spain out of sympathy for the Cuban reconcentrados. What is going to happen here if this system of manufacturing American reconcentrados is allowed to continue?

The transport taxes on mail matter are to be reduced not because there has been any general reduction either in passenger or freight rates. There has been no such reduction, we find, in the last twenty-five years. The rates are too high all along the line except perhaps to the Leiters.

The cost of public transportation is in the first cost of the machine and in its maintenance and operation. The distance that a piece of postal matter, a person, or a ton of freight is carried on the machine makes no practical difference whatever in the cost of its service. Neither does it make any practical difference in the cost of hauling a car whether it be full or empty. There can be no other possible difference in such cost than the use of a little more or a little less coal.

The conclusion of the whole matter is that the present system of determining railway-mail pay is fallacious, misleading, and unjust—unjust both to the railways and to the public.

Evidently the proper solution of the railroad problem is to bring the whole railroad system under the strong arm of the State. The Government should at least own and control the mail, baggage, and express equipment of the country, and paying the railroads for the haulage of the cars a certain stipulated rate per car mile—full or empty—should bring the entire handling of mail and express matter and of baggage under the Post-Office.

Taking the express, mail, and baggage car equipment of the country at 8,000 cars, the cost of this equipment at the average value of similar cars on the New York Central Railroad, $2,500 per car, would be $20,000,000, on which the annual interest at 3 per cent would be	$600,000
Allowing $720 a year for the care and repair of the average mail car (the amount estimated by Mr. Vilas for postal cars in his report of 1887), we have	5,760,000
The Fitchburg Railroad of Massachusetts furnishes its milk contractors with cars, heated in winter, for $5,730 per car per year. The Boston and Maine Railroad taxes its milk contractors but $3,000 per year per car. The gross earnings of an Erie freight car in 1894 were less than $681. Allowing to the railroads for the mere haulage and heating of the baggage, mail, and express equipment $3,000 per car, we have for 8,000 cars	24,000,000
A total of	30,360,000
The tax for railway-mail pay for the fiscal year 1896 was	32,379,619
Railway tax on express service	24,880,383
Total	57,260,202

The saving to the Government from ownership of baggage, mail, and express equipment would be $27,900,202 per year, while allowing to the Government the carriage of baggage absolutely free. Where railway lines pass through a thinly settled country, the ordinary mail agent would be able in many cases to attend to the whole business of handling mail bags, trunks, and express matter.

The Government ownership of our baggage, express, and postal cars would secure to the United States the cheapest letter, parcels, and baggage post in the world.

Germany owns her railways. The Imperial Parcels Post of Germany carries parcels not over 11 pounds in weight distances up to 10 miles for 6½ cents, and for greater distances within the limits of the Empire for 12½ cents. Germany's postal surplus for 1895 was $7,184,822.10. In the period 1887 to 1892 the Government railroads of Prussia not only paid the interest on their cost, they also paid $210,000,000 on the national debt.

If our Government will take possession of our "post roads" as a war measure, the revenues from the low rates named in the general freight and passenger post bill introduced in the House of Representatives at the opening of the present session of Congress will not only meet the interest on the value of the roads, they will also, in a very few years, wipe out the entire debt occasioned by the war with Spain.

When Count Cavour sought to give to Piedmont the headship of a united Italy, when he set himself to work to revive the industries of his country, the first thing he did was to improve the national highways, to lessen transit taxes, to widen opportunities for the people to earn the means for bearing the burdens imposed upon them by war. May we not study with advantage the example of this great Italian?

JAMES L. COWLES.

Mr. QUAY. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will withdraw that motion for just a moment.

Mr. QUAY. Certainly; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. Before the vote is taken, I simply wish to say that the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations spent a great deal of time in investigating this matter, and upon the facts presented by that committee, which practically stand uncontroverted by the investigation, I shall be compelled to vote to lay this amendment on the table. The additional fact ought to be remembered that we have authorized in this bill an investigation to determine whether the conclusions reached by our committee are correct or not, and until that investigation is had and a report made I do not believe it would be wise or just or prudent to cut down the rate 20 per cent.

Mr. QUAY. Now I renew the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senator will withhold the motion just a moment. ["Vote!" "Vote!"] There is no use in any such tactics. I have three or four amendments here to offer. I do not propose to be treated in this style on the floor. The Senator from Missouri is a man for whom we all have respect and——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the motion to lay on the table withdrawn?

Mr. QUAY. I will withdraw it for the purpose of hearing the statement of the Senator from North Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Missouri says it is fair to wait to have an investigation. I hope the honorable Senator from Missouri will take the trouble to see the investigations we have had on this question, when no action has followed. I hope he will read the evidence. I did not have time to go through it to-day, but I am going to put it in the RECORD and print extracts from the different reports. I hold in my hand three of them, full of evidence, commissions appointed, costing $10,000 and $20,000 and $40,000, with big salaries paid and evidence taken, the committees going all over the country, and here are supplementary books of evidence. There are as many as I could bring in my arms. This has been done since we made any reduction. Notwithstanding the investigations no reduction has been made. All the reports show that the pay is too high.

Now we are told that we are going again to put in a provision for an investigation. The last one we had was in 1883. Mr. President, if we could only take the trouble to go and look at what we have already investigated and what we have here in evidence, we would not need any further investigation. You can not get any stronger proof than you have in these three documents which I hold in my hand. For twenty years have we had these reports, and the Senator says it is fair to put off the matter again, in order to investigate. Mr. President, it is absurd.

Mr. QUAY. I renew my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to make an inquiry. Do I understand the Senator from North Carolina to say that he will print all those reports in the RECORD?

Mr. BUTLER. In my speech to-day I gave notice that I would print extracts from these reports.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

Mr. ALLEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I feel pretty well satisfied that he would vote "yea" if he were present, and I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DANIEL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who seems to be absent from the Chamber. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. I will transfer that pair to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON], and vote "yea."

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I have agreed to pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEITFELD] on this question. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (when the name of Mr. PLATT of New York was called). On this question the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. I make the announcement on behalf of both Senators.

Mr. PASCO (when Mr. TELLER'S name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] has already stated the pair of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. The Senator from Colorado requested me to state that if he were present, he would favor this amendment. Therefore he would vote "nay" upon this proposition.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], and therefore I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina to transfer his pair to the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator know how he would vote?

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from South Dakota can state.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] would vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN. I would vote "nay," too. I am informed that the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE]. Therefore I will not vote.

Mr. TURNER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. He is absent from the Chamber, and I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHOUP. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and hence I will withhold my vote.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP] that we transfer our pairs. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON]. Then we can both vote.

Mr. SHOUP. Very well. I vote "yea."

Mr. BUTLER. I vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to announce a pair between the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. BUTLER (after having voted in the negative). The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] has transferred his pair to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON], with whom I was paired. So that would leave me at liberty to vote. The Senator from Iowa made the announcement when he voted.

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 8; as follows:

So Mr. PETTIGREW's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer an amendment which was also sent to the Committee on Appropriations, but they did not report it back.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 13, strike out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "one" and the following:

and that the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1898, per mile per annum, for the service of railway post-office cars, so as to make the above amount appropriated a full compensation for said service. That it being the policy of the United States to carry the mails in the Railway Mail Service in cars belonging to the Government and pay to the railroad companies mileage rates for hauling the same, the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to advertise for six months for sealed proposals to furnish to the Government first-class mail cars of the best and most substantial structure, sufficient in number to perform the railway mail service of the United States. At the end of such advertisement, the Postmaster-General shall open such bids and award to the lowest responsible bidder or bidders a contract for such cars, to be delivered to the Government within six months thereafter. And upon the purchase and delivery of such cars the United States mails shall be carried in such cars, and shall be hauled over the railway lines of the United States under contract with the Postmaster-General: Provided, That the compensation paid to railway companies for the mileage of said cars shall not be greater than the rates paid by individuals and corporations for similar service.

That for the purchase of said postal cars the sum of $3,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

"SEC. 2. That every railroad contracting with the Government to haul its mail cars shall examine and approve the Government's cars as safe and in good condition, and the said company shall be required in the same contract to keep such cars in repair and treat them in all respects as the first-class cars of the said railroad companies shall be treated on its lines, and to be allowed a reasonable compensation therefor, to be fixed in the contract; and any damage which said cars, the persons connected therewith, or the mail matter contained therein may sustain shall be at the risk of the railroad company, for which the Government shall not be responsible. Neither shall the Government be liable for any damage to other cars in the train or to passengers or freight thereon by reason of any defect in the mail car of the United States in such train; and all of these conditions shall be made a part of the contract. And the Postmaster-General shall investigate and report any other matters of reform upon which legislation is needed to decrease the expenses of the Department, without in any way limiting the mail facilities which are now furnished by the Government."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. QUAY. I make the point of order that that is general legislation and not in order on an appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Chair rule upon the point of order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was in doubt as to whether the point of order could be taken on the first part of the amendment, which is to strike out, on page 8, line 13, the word "four" and insert "one."

Mr. QUAY. Any Senator can ask for a division of the question. The latter part of the amendment is undoubtedly out of order.

Mr. FAULKNER. That would make the whole amendment subject to the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. I am sure that Senators understand thoroughly that I can draft an amendment that they can not raise any technical objection to, and I can talk on it. My amendment covers the whole question. If the Senator sees fit to make the point of order, it is questionable whether it is subject to a point of order, because I simply direct how an appropriation of $4,000,000 shall be used. The amendment covers just $4,000,000, exactly what the committee report covers. It is a limitation on the House provision, and certainly it is germane. But if the Senator wants to make the point of order, I can change the amendment so that the point of order will not lie. However, I wanted to speak on the amendment in the shape it is in now, and I trust that the Senator will permit me to do it. If not, I will submit remarks on it in a different shape.

Mr. QUAY. Of course, if the Senator desires to be heard on it, he is at liberty to proceed. But he understands that the hour is very late and we have the agreement to carry out.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I understand more than that. Unfortunately, I understand that talking does no good now. I understand that it does not make any difference what I show, this amendment will be voted down. I understand that it does not make any difference where I get the information or how authentic it is, the amendment will be voted down. I understand all that, but I understand further that some such amendment must be adopted and will be adopted.

Mr. President, I have some facts here that ought to go into the RECORD before this Congress votes $4,000,000. The country ought to know what facts are before it. Let each Senator vote with his eyes open, and if he prefers to shut his eyes, let the country see the facts and know them. I understand thoroughly that a week ago it was decreed that this amendment should be voted down. I understand thoroughly that the railroad lobby around this Chamber has been exultant here for days, seeing that they were certain that they had a big majority. I understand that railway attorneys and officials have been hanging around this Chamber as thick as blackbirds.

Mr. QUAY rose.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand thoroughly that you could not go out of the Chamber without seeing their smiling faces turned to a man like the Senator from South Dakota and myself, as if to say, "We know how the Senate is going to vote, and you do not." I understand thoroughly that the President's chamber has been used out there for a closet room for railroad attorneys and railroad presidents. I understand all those things. I am not in the world with my eyes closed.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, or something in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry, and that is, how the Senator from Pennsylvania, when the Senator from North Carolina has the floor, is entitled to recognition until the Senator from North Carolina yields to him? While the Senator from North Carolina was on the floor and had the recognition of the Chair, without his consent, or without asking his consent, the Senator from Pennsylvania seemed just ready to leap up under him and make a point of order. I submit that it is unparliamentary and that it ought not to be done. Whatever the situation may be, there is no excuse for anything of that kind.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina is proceeding with his speech.

Mr. QUAY. I had the floor, according to my understanding, when I made the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. I had addressed the Chair and the Chair had recognized me. My amendment was read and I still held the floor. The Senator from Pennsylvania had gotten in between us, but I had not yielded the floor. I was not objecting to the Senator from Pennsylvania standing between me and the Chair without having obtained my permission.

Mr. ALLEN. Senators may disagree with the Senator from North Carolina, but that is no reason why this courtesy should be taken away from him.

Mr. QUAY. I have no desire to cut the Senator from North Carolina off, whether his amendment is in order or not. I know nothing about the railroad lobby of which he talks, and I care nothing about it.

Mr. BERRY. With the permission of the Senator from North Carolina, I suggest whether we can not agree to take the vote at some specified hour to-morrow, and not sit here so late to-night. Why can we not agree on a particular hour to-morrow when the vote may be taken, so as to give the Senator from North Carolina an opportunity to conclude?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Arkansas will remember that upon Friday, at the request of the Senator from North Carolina that the matter should go over until to-day, the Senate unanimously agreed that the vote should be taken to-day before adjournment. The Senator in charge of the bill stated that it was done in deference to the Senator from North Carolina, who desired that the bill should go over until to-day, and the Senate then unanimously agreed that the vote should be taken to-night.

Mr. BERRY. I have no desire, of course, to violate any unanimous-consent agreement, unless we could get a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at a particular hour to-morrow. It is not convenient to stay here very late to-night.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that I shall not ask for unanimous consent to change the time, because I agreed to the time being fixed when the question came over from Friday last. I am not going to detain the Senate long. I have a statement here to put in the RECORD, made by Senator Vilas, who was Postmaster-General, which bears out my amendment. I have a quotation here from the Postmaster-General's report, which shows that my amendment is right and says that the appropriation is larger than it ought to be; that it should be $1,000,000 instead of $4,000,000. I also have the recommendation of the head of the Post-Office Department that we ought to own our own postal cars. That may be news to some Senators here. I have no doubt some Senators think it is a wild Populistic scheme. No doubt it is such a patriotic scheme as they can not conceive of as coming from any party but the Populist party; but a Republican Postmaster-General and a Democratic Postmaster-General recommended it.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield to me to make a request?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. My request is that we have a unanimous-consent agreement that we vote on the pending bill and all amendments to it at 4 o'clock to-morrow, without debate after that hour. I think it is quite evident——

Mr. FRYE. Let us finish the bill to-night.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; let us finish it.

Mr. ALLEN. It is quite evident Senators will not get through as quickly as some of them wish to do. There is no disposition, so far as I know, to incommode anybody.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I am not going, either directly or indirectly, to be a party to a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement. I do not want it to be understood because I insist on talking that I am violating the agreement; but I am going to take a little time. In fact, if Senators do not want to hear the matter I wish to read, after my statement of what it is, I will simply put it in the RECORD, and let them vote blindfolded.

Several SENATORS. All right.

Mr. ALLEN. I renew my request. I think it is the wisest thing to do. There are other amendments to be proposed to the pending bill, and there is no use and no kind of propriety in becoming uneasy here because some gentlemen want to go to dinner. I suppose we will all have to eat at some time during the night. I suggest that there be unanimous consent that the bill go over until 2 o'clock to-morrow, or 1 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. The trouble about that is when we start in and break a unanimous-consent agreement——

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is wrong. I insist that we do not break the agreement.

Mr. HALE. Senators have stayed here, and I have stayed myself, because of the unanimous-consent agreement, wanting to go away and being called upon to do so.

Mr. ALLEN. We do not break any unanimous-consent agreement; we simply supersede one unanimous-consent agreement by another, which fixes a definite thing.

Mr. HALE. It has been the invariable rule of the Senate to adhere to such agreements, and never will they be made unless we do adhere to them.

Mr. ALLEN. I know of several instances in my experience where that is not true, but where repeatedly one unanimous-consent agreement was succeeded by another. All I ask is that by unanimous consent we agree to vote at 1, 2, or 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. I shall feel constrained to object to any variation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator wants to object, all right. Let him go ahead.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Senator Vilas, in the Senate, on February 27, 1897, last year, when the Post-Office appropriation bill was pending and a similar paragraph appropriating nearly $4,000,000 for postal cars was under consideration, said:

> I wish to say that in the inquiry I had to make then I had the aid of as accomplished, skillful business and expert railroad man as I believe there is to be found, and as the result I reported at that time.

This is an extract from his report, and it is as follows:

> Careful inquiry discloses that very many of these cars, such as they are, would not cost to build $3,000 each; that the best 50-foot cars can be built for $4,000 to $4,500 each; a new 60-foot car, equal to the most complete and handsome now in the service, for not over $4,800, and that taking together all the post-office cars in the United States, their average value does not, probably, exceed $3,500.

I have read that much, for that is the meat; the rest is argument. I ask that all I have marked on page 2435 may be inserted in the RECORD.

The extract referred to is as follows:

> Then, sir, I was satisfied—and every car in the United States was enumerated; the full number, including all held in reserve, less all in use—that at that time all of the cars in the United States could be bought for $1,600,000; add for cleaning, etc., at $720 a year apiece for the 342 in use, the cost of operation would be $246,240, making a total of $1,846,240. Yet it was necessary under the statute as it stood to estimate a sum of $2,000,000 to pay for the use of them for a single year, the exact amount being $1,881,880, but making allowance for the increase it would be $2,000,000, and in this bill, if I am not mistaken, the amount is $3,000,000. Now, observe that all that is in addition to transportation paid.
> I take the last report of the Postmaster-General, and I turn to the table giving the statistics of the railway lines between New York and Buffalo on the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, length of route 439.58 miles; pay per mile for transportation—that is, outside of the rent of cars—$2,588.09, making total annual rate of pay for transportation $1,137,517.81. That is simply for hauling the postal cars. On that route there are ten lines, as they are called—that is, ten cars of 60 feet each—for which, at $50 apiece, $500 per mile was paid, making a payment for the one year for those ten cars, that could not be worth over $90,000 at the highest price known, $219,760, in addition to the full rate of transportation for drawing them, a rate of transportation which includes furnishing the cars according to statute. Now, that illustrates it.
> I turn to another. Let me turn to this route, No. 110001, Philadelphia and Pittsburg, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, 360 miles in length; pay per mile for transportation, $2,081.07; annual rate of pay for transportation, $736,282; nine cars, 60 feet, $450 per mile annual rate of pay; total for the rent of the nine cars, $159,210.
> In either case they would cost, at the highest rate known, $54,000. In either one of those cases we have paid three times the value of the cars, if we assume them to cost the highest price.
> Now, these are simple illustrations; they are among the heavier and more striking illustrations, taken from that report as it has come in to us from the last submission of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say, while the estimate of $3,500 was a fair average price for all postal cars, Senator Vilas quotes Senator Brice, who sat right under him, and stated that since the time that estimate was made the cost of building a railroad car had decreased; and we all know that we can build a railroad car cheaper now than ten years ago. The report of the Post-Office Department shows that there are 654 postal cars in use and 173 in reserve. I add the 654 in use and the 173 in reserve together, and get a total of 827. I multiply that number by $4,000 for each car. The Postmaster-General estimates $3,500, and Mr. Brice testifies they could be built for less in 1897 than they could in 1887, and yet, to be on the safe side, I put the average at $4,000, and what are the cars worth?

Mr. President, every car in use and every car in reserve to-day is worth, valued at $4,000, only $3,308,000, yet this bill appropriates $4,000,000 for rent. Mr. Vilas goes on to show how absurd that is and argues the whole matter out.

Why did I offer this amendment? My amendment was based, following the computation. I took 10 per cent of the value of the car, which seemed to be like a fair rent, and that amounted to $3,308,000. What did I add to it? I added the highest estimate that has ever been made by the railroads of what it cost to keep a car in repair, what it cost to keep them lighted, heated, furnished with towels, stoves, gas, oil, coal, coal scuttles, soap, etc., and the highest estimate that any railroad official ever gave of the cost for a year was $730; the Department stated it at $720. Then I took $750 a car. That made $485 a year for repairs, for keeping the cars lighted, heated, cleaned, and everything else. Add that together and it makes eight hundred and forty-odd thousand dollars. But I made another estimate.

I estimated that the number of cars would increase 10 per cent during the coming year, while last year the increase was 7 per cent. So I estimated 10 per cent for increase of cars during the year, and I added $48,000 for that, making $865,000, including everything, including 10 per cent rent, $750 a year for each car for repair, lighting, and heating, and $48,000 for the possible 10 per cent increase of cars. That makes only $865,050, but I put my amendment at $1,000,000. I did that in round numbers, because it did look to me as if reducing $4,000,000 any less than $1,000,000 would be a reflection upon the committee.

It looked as if it would be a reflection upon the intelligence of the Senate during all the years it has been voting two and three million dollars for this purpose. In fact, I thought perhaps I had better put the amount at $2,000,000 for decency's sake, so as to get it down by degrees; but no man with a good conscience, who has any regard for the Treasury, who will study the figures—take the reports of the Postmaster-General and take the estimates of the railroads themselves—can figure it out and say that any more than $1,000,000 would be fair unless it is desired to make the railroads a free gift.

I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD from page 2436 of the RECORD of February 27, 1897, the part I have marked in the speech of Senator Vilas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The extract referred to is as follows:

> Mr. VILAS. The railroad companies are generous and liberal, but they generally get a quid pro quo in some form or other. One way in which special facilities are obtained from the roads is by giving them all the mail that would go in a certain direction, for example, except in one or two instances where they have wasted money, like one in this bill now, what is called the special-facilities appropriation. Fast routes have been secured by the agreement of the Department to mass on a line of road all the mail which would naturally go that way, instead of sending it by other roads, or which could as well be sent that way as by other roads. In that way fast-mail service was secured as to Kansas City, gaining a day to points in the Southwest, by arrangement with the Pennsylvania Railroad, all the compensation they got being the regular compensation, but more money because they carried more mail, and for that they were very willing to give extra facilities, although the more mail they carried the less the rate per weight.

I am only pointing out these illustrations to show by facts and figures why it is that I think there is an unnecessary expenditure for railroad mail service.

I will show it in another way in just a word. In 1887, nine years before the present bill was reached, the estimates of the Department for inland transportation by railroad routes and the appropriation were the same—$17,000,000. Now it is $29,000,000 in the pending bill.

Mr. WHITE. How long ago?

Mr. VILAS. Nine years ago. The growth has been from $17,000,000 to $29,000,000—$12,000,000 in nine years. The growth in the mileage has been insignificant. There has been in that time little or no increase in facilities. There has been a considerable increase in the mails, but nothing, in my opinion, to compare with that increase. You can see at once by some other general figures, which I can give in an instant——

Mr. ALLISON. Will I disturb the Senator if I call his attention to the fact that in the ten years there has been an increase of 50,000 miles of railroad, or nearly one-third in ten years?

Mr. VILAS. It may be that the increase has been as great as that in ten years. That would have naturally added, if it was a full third, between five and six million dollars.

Mr. WHITE. I will say to the Senator, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, that the increase of mileage does not mean an increase in the mail carried, because the mileage may have been in portions of the country where the amount of mail was not so great as in the great centers.

Mr. ALLISON. That is undoubtedly true. The increase of railway mileage was in the sparsely settled regions.

Mr. WHITE. Precisely.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course, but the railroads all carry mails.

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. As in the case of the Great Northern, recently completed.

Mr. WHITE. The amount is insignificant, however, as compared with the great centers.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. VILAS. I think there is no question about it that the cost has been extended in accordance with existing law, but what I am doing is to arraign the operation and effect of existing law, and I suggest as an evidence the fact that that law has increased the mail-service expenditure for this item from $17,000,000 to $29,000,000 in nine years. We can not but know that there has been no such increase in the service as to require such an enormous increase of expenditure in nine years, and if you add sixteen hundred thousand dollars for the railway postal cars, it makes $30,600,000. The service has grown, but it has not grown at that rate.

Now, I do not wish to take more time. I was trying simply to show by some striking illustrations of this kind that there is foundation for the belief that if we had strong hands with sufficient power applied to the subject we could work a great saving to the Government. That is my proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. Here is the Postmaster-General's report, and two pages of it are devoted to postal cars. He says that they cost less than $4,000 a car on the average. He says that we are paying twice as much as we ought to pay for a fair compensation if we pay 50 per cent rent. Then he says the only remedy he can see and the one that would work the greatest reform would be for the Government to buy and own its own postal cars and pay a trackage charge. That statement is enough. Nobody will question the argument. I ask that the parts I have marked on pages 56 and 57 of the report of the Postmaster-General for 1887 may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The extracts referred to are as follows:

Among the possibly desirable amendments of present methods, there appears to be one step of great advantage to the Government, one preparatory to any more radical change, which may be immediately taken without the least injustice to the roads. I append a table (Appendix D) showing all the lines of railway on which separate postal cars were, on the 30th of June last, run for the additional pay, their respective lengths, number of trips, annual mileage, number of cars in use and in reserve for contingencies, the size of such cars, average weight of mail, annual transportation pay, annual post-office-car pay, and total compensation; and the whole recapitulated in a summary exhibit. Careful inquiry discloses that very many of these cars, such as they are, would not cost to build $3,000 each, that the best 50-foot cars can be built for $4,000 to $4,500 each, a new 60-foot car equal to the most complete and handsome now in the service for not over $4,000; and that taking together all the post-office cars in the United States their average value does not probably exceed $3,500; certainly not much more.

Pursuing the inquiry into the cost of cleaning, heating, lighting, supplies of oil, ice, dusters, scrub-brushes, soap, lamp-fixtures, pails, and other minor articles of daily use, embracing all necessary labor, and including ordinary repairs, it appears that $30 per month for each car in use is an ample provision. The appended table shows that all the post-office cars in the service of the Department number 432; of which but 342 are in ordinary use, and 90 are in reserve on different lines for contingencies. It is within bounds to affirm that all these might be to-day purchased or their duplicates manufactured for $1,000,000; add for cleaning, etc., as above, at $720 per year each for 342 in use, $246,240, the total is reached of but $1,846,240. Yet simply for the use of these cars for the last year, including cleaning, etc., the Department was under the annual rate of charge by the existing system of $1,881,580, and the estimate deemed necessary to submit in prudent provision for the coming fiscal year, on the same basis, is $2,000,000.

Reference to special instances in the annexed table of the longer lines discovers greater disparity than the average. In illustration, $59,057.75 is annually paid on one line for the use of four cars that might be built and fully equipped in the best modern style for less than $17,500. And this in addition to the full-weight pay for transportation, amounting in the case mentioned to $504,573.60.

Instead, then, of appropriating $2,000,000 to rent the use of these cars for the coming year, why should not the appropriation be of a smaller sum to buy them, and of another, say $250,000, for their keeping, the two together not aggregating the proposed rent? The Department will thereafter gain at least $1,500,000 per year while sustaining the cost of casualties.

This involves no injustice to the railroads. If the change terminated at this point, and each such road should then store, inspect, and transport these cars, as heretofore, for only the weight pay, it would enjoy the advantage of the same rate of compensation given all roads which carry in apartment cars, without the burden of furnishing the use of the cars, or of keeping them.

It can not be objected that the Department is unable properly to assume the charge of these cars. The Department can easily discharge these functions. It might receive the custody of all the cars in the service, and thenceforward care for them, on a month's notice. With moderate addition to its force, the railway mail office can provide for the manufacture of all necessary. Whatever may be done by any private hands may as well be done by the Department.

Ownership by the Government of its postal cars can not but much relieve the difficulties of the compensation problem. So far as they are concerned, their transportation may be compensated, doubtless, by the payment of a just price per mile for the distance each car is run upon a scale not difficult to arrive at fairly, to be accompanied with simple provisions for the protection of the mutual rights of the Government and the transporting companies. The advantages and convenience of such a system will find many strengthening arguments which are not now enlarged upon. Provisionally the continuance of the present rate of payment would be more than just, as has been demonstrated.

The elimination of the lines on which post-office cars are run will much simplify the compensation problem. Payment for transportation in cars of which but a portion is used for mail service can probably be adjusted more easily upon the basis of space employed, the favorite remedy of those who have examined this subject. Such cars will necessarily be drawn in the usual passenger trains, and the vexatious complications touching speed and frequency slip out to a great degree.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no doubt that many Senators do not want to know what the Postmaster-General said; but I know there is not one out of ten who has read his report.

Mr. President, I have a great many facts here. I have got three or four tables showing what it costs to build cars. I have gone to the trouble to secure various statements, and I have a great deal of data here; but the Senate does not want to hear them. If I were to prove that we are paying one hundred times what these postal cars are worth, the Senate would not believe it. It is the most astonishing state of affairs I have ever seen. It does not make a particle of difference what you show. There is not a Senator here who will question the statement I have made; there is no one who can do it. I dare and challenge the world to contradict it. It is official. It shows that a million dollars paid for rent is a profit of nearly 50 per cent; that the million dollars carried in that amendment is a profit of nearly 50 per cent to the railroads. The figures prove it. If the Senate is to make the railroad companies a present of $3,000,000, then let them vote for the provision reported by the committee; but if they want to pay a fair price, in fact, 50 per cent profit, they will adopt my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. QUAY. Now I make the point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator need not do that, because I shall offer another amendment. We may as well vote on that proposition.

Mr. QUAY. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us take a direct vote on the question. There is no necessity for moving to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. QUAY. It is a matter of no consequence to me one way or the other, provided we can have the vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of page 10.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of page 10 it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion, if the Postmaster-General shall consider the location suitable, to accept for the United States, from any person or persons, a parcel of land, not less than 100 feet square, situated in the northwest corner of block 31, original town of Wymore, Gage County, Nebr., provided there shall be erected and completed thereon, without cost to the Government, prior to the time of the acceptance of said tract by the Government, a suitable building for the accommodation of the post-office of the said city of Wymore not less than 40 feet by 60 feet on the ground, the walls to be of stone, or brick, or both, and to be one story in height, constructed in proper proportion, and in a good, workmanlike manner, and suitably planned for the use of a post-office; and so built on said parcel of land that the building shall be left unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 25 feet, including streets and alleys, the donors to give valid title to said land and building, free and clear of all liens and incumbrances of whatever kind, to continue only so long as the same shall be used as a post-office, and to enter into satisfactory bond to pay any or all taxes that may be levied on said property until the State of Nebraska shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be the owner thereof, for all purposes, except the administration of the criminal laws of said State, and the service of civil process therein, said title and bond to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and upon the acceptance of said property by the Secretary of the Treasury, to be held only for the purposes as hereinbefore set forth, the proper authorities are directed to remove and maintain the post-office of said city of Wymore to and within said building so donated.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, as I understand it from a casual reading of it, is a proposition to present to the Government a lot and building in the city of Wymore for a post-office. It comes to the Senate with the indorsement of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and is not subject to the point of order on the part of the committee. I will agree to take it into the conference, if there is no objection.

Mr. ALLEN. One word. I want to say this is a little enterprise on the part of a few business men of Wymore, who want to give this Government an absolute title to the land and construct a building for post-office purposes, so long as the Government will use it for such purposes, without any compensation whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. If the Secretary will turn to page 6, after line 22, on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations I will offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which is the estimate of the Post-Office Department for the expenditure necessary under the military post-office bill we passed this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 22, it is proposed to insert:

For the establishment and maintenance during the existing war, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, temporary post-offices at military posts or camps for the purpose of supplying the officers and troops there encamped with mails, the location of any such post-office to be changed to any other post or camp in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. On page 8, line 16, after the word "dollars," I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 16, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

And if any railroad company shall fail or refuse to furnish suitable and safe postal and apartment cars, or to transport the mails when required by the Post-Office Department and upon the fastest train or trains run on said road, said company shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction thereof be fined not less than $500 nor more than $10,000 for each and every such offense.

Mr. QUAY. I think I will take that into conference without any further discussion.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator accept the amendment?

Mr. QUAY. I accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not wish to discuss the question, but I want to show the reasons for the amendment, and without reading it I want to put into the RECORD extracts from page 55 of the Postmaster-General's report of 1887, the two paragraphs marked, showing the reasons for the adoption of the amendment; also from page 58 of the report for 1887 two paragraphs, which show the reasons for the adoption of the amendment, and from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 27, 1897, page 2433.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from North Carolina will be complied with.

The matter referred to is as follows:

It will be indispensable, at the outset, whatever shall be attempted, to exert the rightful prerogative of Government and impose it as an imperative duty on all railway carriers to accept and transport at the compensation established by law, and according to the statutes and departmental regulations, all mails, mail supplies, postal clerks, and inspectors on duty, with sufficient sanctions to enforce compliance. Unless such legislation be provided, no success upon any plan can be assured. The right to this acquiescence in the purposes of the Government is undeniable. The absence of means to compel acknowledgment by obedience constitutes a menace to the business of the country which ought not to continue.

In 1838 the Parliament of Great Britain enacted a law which it has been unnecessary since to alter, giving to the postmaster-general of the Kingdom power to require any railway company to carry the mails on such a schedule and by such trains as he found necessary to the public service, leaving the question of compensation to be settled by mutual agreement, or, failing that, by arbitration. The latter is rarely resorted to there and is not a satisfactory process. In the United States the Congress has fixed the rates of just compensation by statute, and may continue doubtless to so determine them with justice. In whatever way that be settled, the carrier ought to be without power to deny the use of his transportation, in order to extort more pay or greater advantages than the law has adjudged suitable. His redress of supposed grievances should be sought from the Legislature, not through compulsion of his Government.

The statute is seriously defective in its omission to grant authority to require and compel the service of railroads in mail transportation. So far as the statute goes, it is at the mere option of these common carriers to serve the Government, and it illustrates the defect and evil of it to state that one road, the Old Colony Railroad Company of Massachusetts, has notified the Department of its refusal to comply with the statute if the Department does so by insisting on the provision of cars necessary to proper mail service, a condition which can only be temporized with until Congress shall have opportunity to consider what measures of legislation may be proper.

* * * * * * *

In 1838 the Parliament of England passed a law, which has never since been changed, I believe, for the government of their postal service in reference to the employment of railway mail carriers; at least it had not been changed at the last time I had occasion to look into the subject, and I think it never has been.

I recommended to Congress the first element of that system, and that was this: That an absolute authority should be given to the officers of the United States to compel any railroad to carry the mails. I undertook when charged with departmental service to cut off payments to the railroads which were without a particle of authority of law. I cut them off. A million dollars had been paid for the use of apartments in cars in the likeness of railway postal cars, without a particle of authority to do it. The expenditure had run up to some $90,000 a year at the time when I had the first occasion to look into it, and it was cut off in every instance at once; but the railroads threatened that they would not carry the mails, and one railroad company, the Old Colony Railroad of Massachusetts, refused to carry the mails, notwithstanding, of course, that no payment not otherwise authorized by law was made to that road or any other; and therefore they did not carry the mails for a long time in consequence of that.

Mr. BUTLER. On page 14, section 5, line 14, I move to strike out all after the word "service" down to and including the word "matter," in line 16.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee, on page 14, after the word "service," in line 14, section 5, by striking out:

And all sources of revenue and all expenditures of the postal service, and rates of postage upon all postal matter.

Mr. BUTLER. The purpose of the amendment is clear, and I suppose the Senator from Pennsylvania will accept it for this reason. The discussion here to-day has shown what a tremendous question the question of transportation is alone. Now, this amendment which I have proposed leaves the committee to investigate two questions—the pay to railroads for carrying the mail by weight and the pay for the postal-car service. Those are certainly large enough questions for one committee to investigate; and if you give the committee more than that to do, it will divide its time and scatter over a dozen questions and will bring in a worthless report. The greatest abuse to-day in the Post-Office Department is the question of postal cars and the pay for the transportation of mail by weight. That is what ought to be investigated. Now, do not let us encumber the committee with other side issues that are not important. Let us not fill up a great big book with irrelevant matter, but let us confine it to the two important questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is not in order, the amendment having been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole which the Senator proposes to amend.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will it be in order when the bill gets into the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the Chair to say that it is not in order as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. QUAY. It is not in order until the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. But it will be when the bill gets into the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Now I offer, unless the Senator from North Carolina wishes to do it, the amendment he offered as in Committee of the Whole, confining the investigation to the question of railway mail transportation.

Mr. BUTLER. I move now to strike out all after the word "service," in line 14, page 14, section 5, down to and including the word "matter," in line 16, so that the scope of the investigation will be limited to an investigation of the pay for mail by weight and the pay for postal cars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 14, page 14, section 5, it is proposed to strike out after the word "service:"

And all sources of revenue and all expenditures of the postal service and rates of postage upon all postal matter.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be adopted, because I wish to limit the scope of the investigation to the subjects we have been discussing this year and did discuss last year, and not obscure it by an investigation into these other subjects. I think it would be very proper to have the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads investigate these other questions. It is their province and in the line of their duty to investigate the question of postage, whether or not we can reduce it, and to investigate the question of expenditures.

I believe the Post-Office Department has been extravagantly managed in every respect. I think we have paid too much attention to speed. If it would save five minutes on a letter or something of that sort we have proceeded to expend money lavishly, regardless of who toils to produce it. I think we have gone too fast in that respect. That whole field ought to be gone over, but this investigation should be limited to the subject we have been discussing for two years on the Post-Office appropriation bill. Therefore I hope the amendment will be adopted.

I did not expect that my amendment reducing the compensation 20 per cent would be adopted after we proposed to investigate, but I had a purpose in carrying on this debate. I meant to place the facts in the RECORD which would refute the statement which has been made before the committee and go along with it. I did not propose to let that stand, garbled as it was and peculiar as it was, undisputed. Therefore I carried on this debate for the purpose, also, of emphasizing the necessity of the investigation to such a point that it would not be abandoned in conference. I was afraid of that.

Mr. QUAY. The question suggested by the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina was considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and I think it was the unanimous judgment of that committee, or pretty nearly its unanimous judgment, that little was known as to any of the sources of revenue of the Post-Office Department or of its expenditures; that they were all in the fog, and that the investigation ought to be searching, to cover the entire Department, and be carried to the utmost depth. That being the case, I am unable to agree to the amendment. I move to lay the amendment on the table, unless some Senator desires to discuss it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I will be forced to discuss it, not at any great length, but sufficiently to show clearly why the amendment should be adopted, and I thought certainly the Senator would accept it, it is so plain.

Mr. President, I do not like to charge improper motives. I do not like to be forced to do it, but sometimes it is the quickest way to get at the truth. That amendment, in the shape it is in, has got no purpose, or its purpose is to befog and blind the greater question and at the same time get at a lot of doctored testimony to support the famous, and I may say infamous, Loud bill. That is what it means. I know it. Nine-tenths of the report will be doctored to show why we ought to pass the Loud bill, and one-tenth of it will be given probably to this important question which we have been discussing, and that blinded so that nobody will see what it means.

I saw the honest face of the Senator from Missouri get up and say "let us be fair and wait a year and investigate." Now he is out of his seat. I wish he were here. I should like him to hear this statement and see how he has been fooled, his honesty, his unsuspecting nature appealed to, and here he is running headlong into what he supposes will be an honest investigation. I do not know who drew the amendment. I know the purpose of sticking in those words. I do not know their real purpose, but I am telling you what it will lead to.

Mr. QUAY. The amendment originated in the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and I think it was presented by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. I think it was changed, probably broadened, in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow this amendment to be adopted. I think the scope is wide enough to investigate these questions. They have been here for the last ten years.

Mr. QUAY. I think this investigation ought to have the utmost range. A bill to provide for an investigation of this character has already passed the House and is now in the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. If the amendment which I have offered is not accepted by the committee, then I shall offer still another amendment, and I am not going to stop until I get some satisfactory arrangement here. We have been told to wait a year for an investigation. Then we need two commissions. If we are to have the whole question covered by the Loud bill gone into, then let us have a separate commission for it. Everybody knows that the questions of railroad rates and postal-car rates are big enough for any one committee to investigate, and I am sorry for the men who shall go on the committee if they undertake to do their duty and bring in a report here that is full and complete for the use of the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. I am frank to say that, so far as I am concerned, I voted against the entire amendment in committee. I do not suppose I violate any rule of the Senate in so stating. My theory was that the investigation properly belonged to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BUTLER. Give it to that committee to investigate.

Mr. QUAY. That was my theory, but I was overruled, as I was in the matter of rural free delivery; and I am standing here sustaining the bill as it came from the committee. One can not resist an obstinate man, and if the Senator is determined to occupy time——

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will pardon me, the Senator has just stated that he thought this investigation ought to be conducted by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. Let us divide it and give the question of railroad rates to the special committee and let the Post-Office Committee consider the other question.

Mr. SEWELL. I wish to state as a member of the committee that I never could agree to the amendment except in its present shape. If you are going to investigate any branch of this business, you ought to take it all in. I do not know anything about the Loud bill particularly, except that a great deal of money has been spent upon it that ought not to have been spent. There is a great expenditure for pneumatic tubes, and if you are going to investigate at all, you ought to investigate every cent of receipts and every cent of expenditures.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not want to take the time of the Senate unless it is necessary. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I am going to permit a vote to be taken on the amendment I have offered now, without any further discussion; but if it is not adopted I shall have to offer another amendment. I feel it is my duty to do it. I would not feel like I was an honest man, having stood here and contended for a reduction of rates and having been defeated on account of the proposition that the whole question is to be investigated, to allow a sham investigation and one that will not get at the truth. I would not be an honest man if I did not stand here and fight to the last to prevent the matter from being befogged.

Mr. FAULKNER. Has the Senator from North Carolina examined the bill passed by the House providing for a similar investigation?

Mr. BUTLER. I have read it.

Mr. FAULKNER. I understand—I have not read it, I am frank to say—that it covers exactly the scope of the present amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. No; far from it. I prefer this to the House bill if confined to railroad rates and postal cars.

Mr. FAULKNER. If so, had we not better hold on to this in order to get the House fully to agree to what we want?

Mr. BUTLER. The other is a separate bill. It is on the Calendar here in the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make a remark before this question is passed upon. There have been many reports on the Loud bill, and they were so wide of the mark that if that is gone into I want it gone into by somebody who will take hold of it and get at the facts. While the discussion on the Loud bill has been going on I have had several resolutions and letters making inquiries of the Post-Office Department, and they know no facts which will show where the leak is in it; and notwithstanding that, they get elaborate reports constantly in regard to it which will not hold water. The House voted it down, and I do not want that scheme revived and mixed up with this railroad investigation.

The amendment as it now stands calls for the whole thing, and if the second-class matter is to be examined, it should be done by itself. It is big enough. It ought to be examined and the evils, which there undoubtedly are, remedied. But that bill has struck at many things most useful. It struck at the country press, it struck at cheap literature, which is good, and it struck at many other things very useful to the people. That ought to be investigated by itself, and I do not think the scope of this ought to include it. I fully concur in that respect with the Senator from North Carolina, and I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will accept this one matter. It is big enough. Let us have a committee to investigate the other. The second-class matter should be investigated by itself. If we are going to have an investigation of that, we ought to have two committees or two tribunals.

Mr. QUAY. I have stated the reason why I do not feel free to do so.

I will now suggest that, by unanimous consent, the bill and amendment go over and the vote be taken at 2 o'clock to-morrow. It is evident that we have not a voting quorum of the Senate present, and the Senate is at the mercy of any one man.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the pending bill may go over until to-morrow and that a final vote on amendments and the bill be taken at 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. KYLE. Why not take it now? We have waited until nearly 7 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. There may not be a voting quorum present.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that without further remarks the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 10, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 9, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. CROOK, one of his secretaries.

THE BATTLE OF MANILA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

On the 24th of April I directed the Secretary of the Navy to telegraph orders to Commodore George Dewey, of the United States Navy, commanding the Asiatic Squadron, then lying in the port of Hongkong, to proceed forthwith to the Philippine Islands, there to commence operations and engage the assembled Spanish fleet.

Promptly obeying that order, the United States squadron, consisting of the flagship Olympia, Baltimore, Raleigh, Boston, Concord, and Petrel, with the revenue cutter McCulloch as an auxiliary dispatch boat, entered the harbor of Manila at daybreak on the 1st of May and immediately engaged the entire Spanish fleet of eleven ships, which were under the protection of the fire of the land forts. After a stubborn fight, in which the enemy suffered great loss, these vessels were destroyed or completely disabled and the water battery at Cavite silenced. Of our brave officers and men not one was lost and only eight injured, and those slightly. All of our ships escaped any serious damage.

By the 4th of May Commodore Dewey had taken possession of the naval station at Cavite, destroying the fortifications there and at the entrance of the bay and paroling their garrisons. The waters of the bay are under his complete control. He has established hospitals within the American lines, where 250 of the Spanish sick and wounded are assisted and protected.

The magnitude of this victory can hardly be measured by the ordinary standards of naval warfare. Outweighing any material advantage is the moral effect of this initial success. At this unsurpassed achievement the great heart of our nation throbs, not with boasting or with greed of conquest, but with deep gratitude that this triumph has come in a just cause, and that by the grace of God an effective step has thus been taken toward the attainment of the wished-for peace. To those whose skill, courage, and devotion have won the fight, to the gallant commander and the brave officers and men who aided him, our country owes an incalculable debt.

Feeling as our people feel, and speaking in their name, I at once sent a message to Commodore Dewey, thanking him and his officers and men for their splendid achievement and overwhelming victory and informing him that I had appointed him an acting rear-admiral.

I now recommend that, following our national precedents and expressing the fervent gratitude of every patriotic heart, the thanks of Congress be given Acting Rear-Admiral George Dewey of the United States Navy for highly distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy, and to the officers and men under his command for their gallantry in the destruction of the enemy's fleet and the capture of the enemy's fortifications in the Bay of Manila.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 9, 1898.

[Applause.]

COMMODORE GEORGE DEWEY, U. S. N., AND OTHERS.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report forthwith the following resolution, and to ask its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, unanimously report the following resolution with recommendation of its immediate passage:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 210) tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore George Dewey, United States Navy, and to the officers and men of the squadron under his command.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in pursuance of the recommendation of the President, made in accordance with the provisions of section 1508 of the Revised Statutes, the thanks of Congress and of the American people are hereby tendered to Commodore George Dewey, U. S. N., commander in chief of the United States naval force on the Asiatic station, for highly distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy, as displayed by him in the destruction of the Spanish fleet and batteries in the harbor of Manila, Philippine Islands, May 1, 1898.

SEC. 2. That the thanks of Congress and the American people are hereby extended through Commodore Dewey to the officers and men under his command for the gallantry and skill exhibited by them on that occasion.

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States be requested to cause this resolution to be communicated to Commodore Dewey, and, through him, to the officers and men under his command.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, it is unnecessary that I should add any word of commendation in behalf of that resolution. I feel that the whole grand story has been so much better told by the ringing thunder of Dewey's guns in Manila Bay that I ask the House of Representatives to unanimously and by acclamation pass this resolution, tendering the thanks of the Congress and the American people to the gallant commodore in chief and the splendid officers and men under his command for achieving for American arms one of the most marvelous, brilliant victories in the annals of naval warfare. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move that it be done by a rising vote.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I accept the gentleman's suggestion.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and unanimously passed. [Applause.]

A MEMBER. Reconsider.

INCREASE OF NUMBER OF REAR-ADMIRALS.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is not necessary to move to reconsider and lay that on the table. Now, Mr. Speaker, by instruction of the Naval Committee, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk. I will briefly say that under the Revised Statutes of the United States in time of war a promotion to the grade of rear-admiral is made only for distinguished gallantry in conflict with the enemy, upon resolutions granting the thanks of Congress, upon recommendation of the President of the United States. In accordance with that statute, the Committee on Naval Affairs have instructed me to introduce a bill in this body for immediate consideration, and I may state that a similar bill has been or will be introduced in another body, in order to enable the Executive of the United States to carry out without delay the wishes of the American people that the highest honor possible under our laws may be paid to that distinguished naval officer who has illustrated the heroism and glory of the American Navy by adding another brilliant page to its history. I ask immediate consideration of the bill for the addition of another rear-admiral, for purposes understood by the House.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10251) fixing the number of rear-admirals in the United States Navy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the number of rear-admirals in the United States Navy now allowed by law be, and is hereby, increased from six to seven, and this act shall be construed and taken as validating and making in force and effect any promotion to said rank of rear-admiral in the United States Navy made heretofore or hereafter and during the existing war and based upon the thanks of Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, before unanimous consent is given, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine if under the existing law Commodore Dewey would not be entitled to promotion by virtue of the fact that the Congress has thanked him by name?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Under the statute he would not. There is no rear-admiralship to which he could be promoted, and the statute provides that during the time of war promotion to the grade of admiral can only be made under conditions like those of the present. To enable this promotion to be made this bill creates an additional position of rear-admiral, to which this officer, in the discretion of the Executive, may be appointed. I will state further to the gentleman that this action of mine and the Committee on Naval Affairs is based on consultation with the executive department, with the Senate, and ourselves, and is absolutely essential to carry out the purpose which I infer is in the heart of every member of the House, to enable the President to confer upon Commodore George Dewey the well-earned title of rear-admiral in the United States Navy.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that no title and no office that the Congress can confer upon Commodore Dewey will increase the respect in which the American people hold him. I am sure that he would rather enjoy the satisfaction that comes from this well-earned victory than to take any additional honor and emolument which Congress could confer upon him. I do not intend in this case to make an objection, for it is a peculiarly meritorious one; but I think we might as well understand now that the spirit of patriotism so highly commendable is not to be made a pretext for creating a large number of important and highly salaried offices. This particular case I shall not object to; but it must be a very exceptional case if I consent to the creation of any new and permanent office during this war.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I desire to say that this is a case without exception, and I deem it without a parallel, without a precedent in the history of any war.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK obtained the floor.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a statement?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. I wish to say to the House that it was the intention of the Committee on Military Affairs to call up to-day what is known as the engineer and immune bill. But in view of the agreement of the members of the House committee for two hours' debate, I am assured by very many members that they would not consent to take it up to-day. I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin who has charge of the District business to agree to yield to me when a message comes from the Senate, so that by unanimous consent we may take up the bill for the purpose of feeding and arming the people of Cuba during the present war.

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly; I will agree to that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman tell us when the bill to which he has referred will be taken up?

Mr. HULL. I think we shall not be able to get it up unless the Committee on Rules will report a rule for the purpose.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. A number of persons from whom I have heard are very anxious that the bill should pass. I have several telegrams on that subject in my possession. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

ALLEY IN SQUARE 465.

Mr. BABCOCK. This being District day, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9068) to authorize Commissioners of District of Columbia to extinguish alley in square 465.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to abandon the alley abutting the south 36 feet by a width of 3.33 feet of sublot 86, and the west 16.31 feet by a width of 3.5 feet of sublot 85, square 465, city of Washington, the said land to revert to the present owner of said lots 85 and 86, Charles Schafer, his heirs and assigns, provided he pays an amount equal to the sum that would have been assessed against the land embraced within the area of said alley from the time it was laid out to the time it is extinguished.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] that he may make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for closing a little alley in the southwestern portion of the city—an alley 3 or 3½ feet wide by about 30 feet long. It never was any part of the public streets or alleys of the District of Columbia. It is a private alley upon private property. The District Commissioners now join in the recommendation that it be closed because it is practically a nuisance, and should be closed. The proposition is that the title go back to the individual who owns the land of which it is properly a part.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is there any objection made to closing this alley by the owners of the property abutting on the alley?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is only one property owner concerned; he owns the whole of the abutting property. There is no objection; and the proposition is to require him to pay all that has been assessed for taxes and other purposes against the alley by the District during the time it has been used as an alley. This he agrees to do. And the District Commissioners recommend that the bill pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ANNA MERKEL.

Mr. BABCOCK. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9856) for the relief of Anna Merkel. As this bill is a small matter, I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask that the bill be read before consent is given.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to refund and repay to Anna Merkel, or her legal representatives, the sum of $77.27, being the residue of interest and penalties upon arrearages of general taxes paid by her on lot 300, in square 131, for the fiscal years 1892, 1893, and 1894.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. DOCKERY. I think a bill of this kind ought not, in general, to be considered in the House. The only excuse for the request in this case is that the amount involved is only $77. For that reason I do not object.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill, as it proposes to return interest and penalties. I do not understand that it has ever been the policy of Congress to pay interest to anybody, either the District of Columbia or anywhere else.

Mr. JENKINS. The interest which this bill proposes to return is not such as the gentleman from Missouri has in his mind. It is interest which was unlawfully collected from Anna Merkel by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. They unlawfully assessed against the property described in the bill taxes for the years 1892, 1893, and 1894, and she was compelled under protest to make payment. They added to the taxes $77.27 for interest and penalties. Afterwards they discovered that they had acted erroneously, and this woman was referred to Congress for relief. A bill proposing to refund the entire amount unlawfully imposed was introduced at this session, but as the Commissioners of the District could refund the amount of taxes illegally assessed, the bill was laid upon the table and this one introduced for the amount of interest and penalty unlawfully assessed.

The law is clear that while the Commissioners had authority to pay back the taxes, they had not the right to refund this amount of $77.27 which was erroneously taken from the claimant in this case. They have paid her back the amount of the taxes taken erroneously and now ask Congress for authority to make restitution of this sum, which is wrongfully held by the District authorities.

Mr. DOCKERY. What was the particular thing the Commissioners did that makes this necessary?

Mr. JENKINS. Why, the property was not liable for the amount of the tax assessed against it. The assessment proposed was not set aside by the courts. The applicant in this case had no redress, being informed that this sum of $77.27 illegally taken from her must be refunded by Congress. This was paid by her into the treasury of the District and is now in the hands of the District authorities.

The bill was submitted, I will state, to the Commissioners of the District, who carefully examined it, as well as the prior bill to which I referred. It was also considered by the attorney for the District, and approved by that officer, and its passage is recommended by all who know the facts.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand the bill, you do not propose to pay interest upon the withheld sum, but simply to refund the amount erroneously taken?

Mr. HULL. That is all the bill does.

Mr. JENKINS. This amount was wrongfully taken from her in the first instance. I ask a vote.

The bill was considered, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and having been read the third time, was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCEWAN, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 4518. An act to provide assistance to the inhabitants of Cuba, and arms, munitions, and military stores to the insurgent forces, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5975) extending the homestead laws and providing for right of way for railroads in the District of Alaska.

ARMED ASSISTANCE TO CUBANS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, in accordance with an agreement heretofore made, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], who wishes to call up a bill which has just come over in the message from the Senate received a few moments ago.

Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4518) just reported from the Senate. I ask that it be taken from the table and put upon its passage, with the amendment recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House.

Mr. COX. This is a bill, if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. HULL. After consent is given for the consideration I will be glad to answer any questions.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to the present consideration of the bill.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 4518) to provide assistance to the inhabitants of Cuba, and arms, munitions, and military stores to the insurgent forces, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That while serving in Cuba during the existing war officers of the Army of the United States exercising separate commands may, by special order, cause subsistence, medical, and quartermaster's supplies to be issued to, and other aid rendered to, inhabitants of the Island of Cuba who are destitute and in imminent danger of perishing unless they receive the same.

SEC. 2. That the President, and general officers commanding troops in Cuba, are hereby authorized to furnish to the proper officers of the Cuban insurgents such arms, ammunitions, equipments, and military stores and supplies as they may require to render the services of that army as allies in the existing war available, and may enlist, not to exceed fifty for each brigade, inhabitants of the Island of Cuba qualified to serve as interpreters, guides, scouts, and assistants.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask one question of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I suppose that he has the amendment which was agreed upon by the committee to be offered here?

Mr. HULL. I have the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

By instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I move to strike out the second section of the bill and insert what I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 2. That the President and general officers commanding troops in Cuba are hereby authorized to furnish to the Cuban people such arms, ammunition, equipments, and military stores and supplies as they may require, in order to increase their effective force in the existing war."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the intendment of the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is to strike out the word "insurgents" in this paragraph of the bill and insert "people?"

Mr. HULL. That is correct; and it also strikes out the provision for enlisting so many Cubans in our Army, and makes the second section of the bill read in conformity with the previous action of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will that cut off the Cuban people from rendering military assistance to our troops?

Mr. HULL. They could not enlist under this provision. That is all.

Mr. RIDGELY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. Your amendment provides for allowing sufficient arms and equipments to the Cubans. Is that a gift to them?

Mr. HULL. I would state to the gentleman that these are munitions and equipments furnished to Cuba on the assumption that it will enable them to render more efficient services in bringing the war to a speedy conclusion. The contention is that the people there are without proper arms and munitions, and this action on the part of our Government is a step in the way of aiding them to bring the war to a conclusion.

Mr. RIDGELY. Does the expression "and other munitions of war" include provisions?

Mr. HULL. I suppose that "munitions of war" would mean whatever was necessary to make them an effective force, and that provisions, as a rule, would be included.

Mr. MARSH. "Military stores and supplies" would cover that.

Mr. HULL. Yes; "military stores" will cover that.

Mr. LOVE. Is there any provision for feeding the suffering and starving?

Mr. HULL. Yes; the first section covers that.

Mr. RIDGELY. I should like to know how it is possible to feed those reconcentrados who are within the Spanish lines?

Mr. HULL. That can not be done, and the bill does not attempt to do an impossibility.

Mr. ALLEN. We will get inside the Spanish lines and feed them. [Applause.]

Mr. LOVE. I very much hope we may.

Mr. HULL. Our generals in command in Cuba will hardly issue food to people who are not inside their own lines.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I should like to ask a question. The purpose of the bill, you say, is to furnish the people of Cuba with arms. As I understand, there is nobody there in arms except the insurgents whom we want to help. Why do you strike out the word "insurgents?"

Mr. HULL. If the insurgents are not the people of Cuba, they would not come in under this bill.

The object is that if there are two or three hundred people who come up and are ready to be organized into a troop, that we can arm them and let them be effective. If we have to wait until an officer is appointed, and all that, it may defeat the very object which we have in view. The amendment provides for arming the people of Cuba who want to fight for their own liberty. The first section provides for feeding those whom we have within our lines, whom we wish to feed and care for as rapidly as they can be gathered together, so as to prevent their starving. I ask for a vote.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HULL. I move to amend the title by striking out "insurgent forces" and inserting the words "the people of the Island of Cuba," so as to conform to the text of the bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the title will be considered as amended.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed was laid on the table.

WILLS AFFECTING REAL ESTATE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 1910) conferring on the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to take proof of the execution of wills affecting real estate, and for other purposes. I ask that that part which has been stricken out be omitted in the reading. The bill as reported is practically a substitute.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the part stricken out will be omitted in the reading.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the act of Congress entitled "An act relating to the supreme court of the District of Columbia," approved June 21, 1870, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"That all the powers and jurisdiction by law held and exercised by the orphans' court of Washington County, District of Columbia, prior to the 21st day of June, A. D. 1870, are hereby conferred upon the supreme court of the District of Columbia. Such powers and jurisdiction shall continue to be exercised by one of the justices of said court holding a special term or orphans' court business, and from his judgments, orders, and decrees there shall be the same right of appeal to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia as is given by section 7 of the act of Congress establishing said court of appeals, approved February 9, 1893: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall divest said court or said special term or said justice of any power or jurisdiction conferred upon said court or said special term or said justice by existing law.

"SEC. 2. That in addition to the jurisdiction conferred in the preceding section of this act, plenary jurisdiction is hereby given to the said court holding the said special term to hear and determine all questions relating to the execution and to the validity of any and all wills devising any real estate within the District of Columbia and of any and all wills and testaments properly presented for probate therein, and to admit the same to probate and record in said special term; and neither the execution nor the validity of any such will or testament so admitted to probate and record shall be impeached or examined collaterally, but the same shall be in all respects and as to all persons res judicata, subject, nevertheless, to the provisions hereinafter contained.

"SEC. 3. That all issues of fact hereafter arising in the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a special term for orphans' court business, including those relating to the execution of the validity of any will or testament, shall hereafter be tried before said justice holding said special term, and that when required for such purpose jurors shall be drawn in the manner now by law provided for the drawing of jurors for service at the special term of the supreme court of the District of Columbia sitting as a circuit court for said District.

"SEC. 4. That no will or testament shall be hereafter admitted to probate and record in the said District until the following procedure shall have been followed: Whenever any will or testament shall be presented for probate and record to the said justice he shall direct all of the heirs at law or next of kin of the testator, or both, as the case may require, to be summoned to appear before him at a certain day, not earlier than ten days from the date of said presentation. If said summons shall be returned personally served upon all of said heirs at law or next of kin, or both, at least five days before said return day, then, if no caveat be filed to said will, the said justice may forthwith admit the same to probate and record. But if any of said heirs at law or next of kin be returned 'not to be found,' then the said justice shall cause not less than thirty days' notice of the application for such probate to be published in some newspaper of general circulation in the District of Columbia, and may order such other publication as the case may require; and upon such notified day, or such subsequent day as the court shall appoint, the said application for probate shall be heard, due proof of such publication being made; and if no caveat be filed, the said will or testament shall be admitted to probate and record. In all cases in which all of the heirs at law or next of kin of a testator, or both, consent to such probate and record, such will and testament shall thereupon be forthwith admitted to probate and record without the hereinbefore described proceedings. In all cases in which any of said heirs at law or next of kin is an infant or of unsound mind the said justice shall appoint a guardian ad litem for said infant or person of unsound mind: Provided, That in no case shall any will or testament be admitted to probate and record save upon formal proof of its proper execution.

"SEC. 5. That the preceding sections of this bill shall be subject to the following proviso: Any person interested in said probate who at the time of the final decree admitting any will or testament to probate and record is within the age of 21 years may file a caveat to said will within one year after he becomes of age; and any person so interested who at the said time was returned 'not to be found' and was proceeded against by order of publication may file such caveat within two years after the date of said final decree; and any person actually served with process or personally appearing in said proceedings may file such caveat within one year after said date.

"SEC. 6. That whenever any caveat shall be filed issues shall be framed under the direction of the court for trial by jury: Provided, That in all cases in which all persons interested are sui juris and are before the court, the issues may be tried and determined by the court without a jury upon the written consent of all such parties. At least ten days prior to the time of trial all of the heirs at law or next of kin of the decedent, or both together, with all persons claiming under the will, shall be each served with a copy of said issues and a notification of the time and place of the trial thereof. If any of them be an infant or of unsound mind he shall have a guardian ad litem appointed for him by the court before such trial shall proceed. If, as to any party in interest, the notification shall be returned 'not to be found,' the court shall assign a new day for such trial, and shall order publication at least twice a week for a period of not less than four weeks of a copy of the issues and notification of trial in some newspaper of general circulation in the District of Columbia, and may order such other publication as the case may require. And the supreme court of the District of Columbia may from time to time prescribe and revise rules and regulations for service personally upon such party outside of the District of Columbia of a copy of such issues and notification, but personal service upon absent defendants shall in no case be essential to the jurisdiction of the court in the premises. Upon the day notified, or such subsequent day as the court shall appoint, the court shall proceed with the trial of said issues, due proof of such publication and, when required, of such personal service being made, and due opportunity being given to any party in interest to demand other and further issues. On the trial of any such issue exceptions may be taken to the rulings of the court, which shall be embodied in a bill of exceptions, to be settled and signed by the justice presiding within such time as may be fixed by the rules of practice prescribed from time to time by the supreme court of the District of Columbia in general term, and the said justice shall have the same power to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial that is possessed and exercised by the supreme court of the District of Columbia in cases tried with a jury according to the course of the common law, and as to such trials shall have all other powers now vested by law in the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a special term as a circuit court. In all cases in which such issues shall be tried the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court thereupon shall, subject to proceeding in error and to such revision as the common law provides, be res judicata as to all persons, nor shall the validity of any such judgment be impeached or examined collaterally.

"SEC. 7. That in addition to the power and jurisdiction conferred by this act and by prior laws upon the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a special term for orphans' court business, said court is hereby given plenary authority to administer also the real estate situated in the District of Columbia of decedents, so far as may be necessary for the payment of debts and legacies, and to distribute among those entitled thereto any surplus proceeds of any sale of real estate made in the course of such administration, and that the bonds hereafter executed of all executors and administrators shall be responsible for the proceeds of sale of all real estate sold by them under the order of the said justice for such purposes of administration: Provided, however, That no such sale shall be made unless the same be required for the purposes of paying debts and such legacies as are chargeable upon the real estate, nor until the auditor of the court shall have ascertained and reported a deficiency of personal assets for such purposes, and such report shall be subject to exception.

"SEC. 8. That the foregoing sections of this act shall apply only to wills and testaments hereafter offered for probate, and, in cases of intestacy, to the estates of such persons as shall die after the passage of this act: Provided, That the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a term for orphans' court business upon the petition of any person interested under any will heretofore filed in said court may offer the same for probate as a will of real estate, whereupon such proceedings shall be had as by this act are authorized in regard to wills hereafter offered for probate.

"SEC. 9. That the said justice may authorize and direct collectors heretofore or hereafter appointed to discharge pendente lite all or any of the duties of an administrator.

"SEC. 10. That the supreme court of the District of Columbia in general term is hereby authorized and empowered to make all such rules of practice as shall be necessary for the exercise of the jurisdiction hereby conferred, and to revise and alter such rules from time to time as it may deem proper.

"SEC. 11. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the gentleman explain this bill. It seems to me to be a very important one, making very great changes in the legislation affecting these subjects.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] who reported the bill.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, the bill is one of considerable importance. It has been very carefully considered at length by the Committee on the District of Columbia. The subject was brought to the attention of the committee by the bar of the District of Columbia. The amendment suggested by the committee was prepared by the bar of the District. The House bill was submitted to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and they unanimously favored it. It was also submitted to the court of appeals, consisting of three judges, and they unanimously favored it. It was further submitted to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, consisting of six judges, and five of them unconditionally approved of the House bill, while Mr. Justice Hagner, who dissents from the House bill and favors the Senate bill, says in a letter to your committee that to leave things in their present condition would be a real calamity, and he wants the evils of the present law remedied. He is in favor of a radical change in the law.

In this District they now follow the law of 1798. There never has been any change in the law since 1801. The views of Mr. Justice Hagner were fully set forth in House Report 1235, and, as this question is important, it may be best to consider the objections of Mr. Justice Hagner.

Before considering in detail the objections of Mr. Justice Hagner it will be proper to call attention to his letter to the Hon. CHARLES J. FAULKNER printed in connection with Report No. 574 from the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia. This letter was written in reference to Senate bill No. 1910, Fifty-fifth Congress, the report wherein is as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1910) conferring on the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to take proof of the execution of wills affecting real estate, and for other purposes, make a favorable report thereon.

The bill proposes to amend the laws of the District of Columbia in regard to the probate of wills affecting real estate so as to make the law in this District conform to what has been the law in the States for upward of a century. A full discussion of the bill is to be found in the letter of Mr. Justice Hagner, of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, as given below.

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1898.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I write you in reference to Senate bill No. 1910, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, which I understand was referred to you and Senator KENNEY as members of the District of Columbia Committee.

This bill is of great importance. Its purpose is to give to the supreme court of the District of Columbia a jurisdiction that for many years it was assumed was possessed by the orphans' court.

It has recently been settled in Campbell vs. Porter (162 U. S., 478) that this court, when holding a special term for the transaction of orphans' court matters, is without jurisdiction to admit to probate and record a will devising real estate alone, and where personal estate is also bequeathed the probate is only operative as to personal property. The result is that in every controversy in any court of equity or law involving the disposition of real estate, devised by will, the testamentary instrument must be established in such court by the testimony of the attesting witnesses, notwithstanding the orphans' court, a branch of the same court, may have already taken the testimony of all the subscribing witnesses, and admitted the paper to probate and record as a will of personalty.

Our law in this particular is to-day substantially the same as it existed in England over one hundred and fifty years ago. In 1742 Lord Chancellor Hardwicke took occasion to denounce this divided and independent jurisdiction as a very great absurdity, and expressed the wish that "gentlemen of ability would take this inconvenience and absurdity into their consideration and find out a proper remedy by the assistance of legislation."

Lord Chancellor Baron Yelverton, referring to this situation, said, in 1785: "I believe no two cases can be supposed to be more intimately connected with each other, both in unity of time and of assurance, than a will of real and personal estate written upon one and the same pieces of paper or parchment and subscribed by one and the same signature. And yet it is clear law that, though the probate of such a will is conclusive evidence of the sanity of the testator to make such a will, yet it is by no means conclusive evidence of his capacity to dispose of his real estate. And why? Evidently because the capacity of a party to do the two acts is triable by different jurisdictions. * * * From all of which I am warranted to lay it down as a general position that the capacity of a party to do one act is not conclusive of his capacity to do another, if his capacity as to that other be triable by a different jurisdiction, whether the two acts make one and the same assurance or are done at one and the same time or not."

The result of the unsatisfactory condition of the law on this subject is that notwithstanding the fact that a will presented for probate as to personalty, and sustained by a jury on the trial of issues attacking its validity, has afterwards been admitted to probate by the orphans' court, may yet be contested de novo in an action involving real property on the same points previously decided by a jury rendering a verdict in favor of the will.

It is essential that some remedy should be provided at once, since the act of July 8, 1898 (which it was thought by some gave greater efficacy to recorded wills), has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case above referred to, to be ineffective to enlarge the jurisdiction of this court when holding special term for the transaction of probate matters in the particular referred to.

The effect of the decision in Campbell vs. Porter has caused no little annoyance to property holders, and in many instances special proceedings have already been instituted in equity to establish wills devising real property. This proceeding is expensive and imposes an unnecessary hardship on the parties in interest.

May we bespeak your kind attention to this matter, and urge that you and Senator KENNEY will interest yourselves in regard hereto at an early date?

Very respectfully,

A. B. HAGNER, Associate Justice.

Hon. CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
United States Senate.

It will be observed that in this letter the writer, after calling attention to the fact that the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a special term for orphans' court business is without jurisdiction to admit to probate and record a will devising real estate alone, and the further fact that where personal estate is also bequeathed the probate is only operative as to personal property, says:

The result is that in every controversy in any court of equity and law involving the disposition of real estate, devised by will, the testamentary instrument must be established in such court by the testimony of the attesting witnesses, notwithstanding the orphans' court, a branch of the same court, may have already taken the testimony of all the subscribing witnesses and admitted the paper to probate and record as a will of personalty.

The letter, after calling attention to the utterances of Lord Hardwicke and Baron Yelverton, which are contained in the report of this committee, proceeds as follows:

The result of the unsatisfactory condition of the law on this subject is that, notwithstanding the fact that a will for probate as to personalty, and sustained by a jury on the trial of issues attacking its validity, has afterwards been admitted to probate by the orphans' court, it may yet be contested de novo in an action involving real property on the same points previously decided by a jury rendering a verdict in favor of the will.

This shows that when this letter was written the writer appreciated the anomalous situation which permitted the will of a decedent to be solemnly adjudged a valid will and at the same time an invalid one by two contradictory judgments in the same court. Yet, while forcibly stating the evil of this anomaly and while apparently undertaking to offer a remedy for it, he proposes a measure which does not at all deal with the substance of the evil. Under the Senate bill the decree of the special term for orphans' court business has only the effect of establishing as a prima facie case the validity of a will of a decedent as to real estate. The same will which has been solemnly admitted to record as a valid will both as to personalty and realty can nevertheless be assailed in ejectment as an invalid will of realty. While the probate of the will by the orphans' court establishes prima facie evidence of its validity, it does not go further than that, and the anomaly may still be presented of a will involving both realty and personalty attacked in the probate court on the ground of want of testamentary capacity, tried by a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of the testamentary capacity of the testator. And yet the same person who as next of kin filed a caveat upon this ground of testamentary incapacity and was beaten upon it may try the same issue over again, perhaps against the same adversary, in an action of ejectment, and may succeed upon it, despite the Senate bill if it should become a law.

It is thus seen that while Judge Hagner admits the existence of this anomaly and deplores it, he yet offers no remedy whatever for its removal, the whole effect of his bill being to change the order of proof in actions of ejectment where the validity of a will is involved by requiring the assailants of the will to put in their evidence first.

When H. R. 8345 was introduced, copies of it were sent to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia and the supreme court of the District of Columbia. Judge Hagner objected to this bill, and his objections are printed in full at the conclusion of the committee's report. While he had in his letter to Senator FAULKNER recognized as a fact that the principal evil to be corrected was these contradictory verdicts in the same courts upon the same will, nevertheless in expressing his objections to H. R. 8345 he speaks as if the only object to be attained was the mere convenience of allowing an order of the orphans' court admitting a will to probate as a will of real estate to enable the party relying upon it to dispense with the proving of the will by witnesses.

Every lawyer knows that to say that certain proof shall be prima facie, but only prima facie, is simply a measure of convenience of proof. Judge Hagner proceeds to state his objections in detail, and we shall consider them as he has numbered them:

1. It is assumed that because H. R. 8345 gives unconditional jurisdiction to the supreme court of the District of Columbia it deprives it of jurisdiction that it previously had. This objection seemed unsubstantial. Nevertheless, in order to entirely obviate it, the substituted bill which is recommended by the report of the Judiciary Committee contains language which entirely removes all force from this objection.

2. The next objection is to the trial of the issues at the special term holding an orphans' court. It is sufficient to say with respect to this that there could be no reason why issues which are framed in one branch of the court should go through the useless form of being sent in to another room to be tried by another branch of the court. It is much simpler and less expensive to have the judge holding the term in which they originated and who knows all about them himself determine them in that very court with the aid of a jury. Because in Maryland or in Baltimore it is thought proper to adhere to this indirect method is no reason why in the city of Washington the issues should not be tried where they properly belong. The indirect method is from its very nature unnatural and objectionable; the simpler and more direct process is the one which should be followed.

3. The third and most surprising objection is that these issues from the special term sitting as an orphans' court are not tried quickly enough. The real difficulty is that under Maryland law, one hundred years old and still in force in this District, these issues are given priority over the regular cases pending in the circuit courts. Many of these issues in will cases consume from four to six weeks in their trial. Thus the ordinary suitors in the common-law courts have their business interfered with and blocked for weeks and months by the preference given to these will cases and their injection in a court where they do not properly belong. The calendars of the circuit courts are always crowded, while a whole week's business of the probate court is generally disposed of in part of a single day.

4. It is suggested that some doubt exists under H. R. 8345 as to whether or not a bill of exceptions would lie. Without considering the force of this, all strength in this objection has been taken away by expressly providing in the substituted bill recommended in the report (section 6, lines 12–24) for the taking of bills of exceptions.

5. So, again, the suggestion with reference to section 7 of H. R. 8345 has been met in section 7 of the substituted bill. The objection urged against the giving of jurisdiction to the special term for orphans' court business to order the sale of real estate for the payment of debts would seem to be absolutely without force. There is no reason why a creditor whose debt can not be paid in full by reason of deficiency of personal assets should be compelled to file an elaborate bill in equity and subject himself to all the formalities of equity proceedings in order to have the real estate of his debtor sold for the payment of a debt. The general practice elsewhere in the United States and the reason of the thing are both in favor of giving the creditor a complete remedy with respect to both personalty and realty in the one probate court. For many years it has been the custom to assign to the probate term of the supreme court of the District a judge who is also assigned to one of the equity terms. It is a very common occurrence for the same judge who orders the distribution of the personalty of the decedent in the probate court to hear and determine in another room in the same building a case in equity growing out of a bill filed for the sale of the real estate of the same decedent because the personal property is insufficient to pay the debts in full. In both courts the presiding justice acts without a jury. It would seem that the unnecessary expense incurred by the parties in carrying on two separate and independent litigations in different courts before the same judge would of itself be a sufficient reason for giving power to dispose of the whole matter to one branch of the court.

6. That testimony could not be taken by the register of wills is a novel suggestion, inasmuch as it has been done repeatedly and is as a matter of practice taken by him whenever the occasion arises. See, for instance, the record in the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Benjamin's Heirs vs. Du Bois, reported in 118 United States, page 46. In that case a great mass of testimony was taken upon an issue pending in the probate court as to the domicile of the testator whose will was in dispute, the parties having waived the sending of an issue to the circuit court for trial by jury. All the testimony was taken by the register under an order of reference made in the case by the justice then presiding in the probate court.

7. The suggestion that no provision is made by legislation for issuing subpœnas or keeping dockets does not seem to be a material one. The supreme court of the District of Columbia has power in all its branches to have subpœnas issued. It is not thought that an act of Congress is required to enable a docket to be kept. The Supreme Court is empowered by its organic act to pass all rules of practice, and these minute matters can surely be covered by these rules. If not, it would seem that the proper remedy is not to abandon legislation so necessary, but to amend the bill by expressly giving the power.

8. The suggestion that the provisions of sections 2 and 5 are liable to encourage fraudulent practices in the concealment of wills seems based upon some misconception. Neither H. R. 8345 nor the substituted bill recommended by this committee at all prevents a valid will from being offered for probate no matter when discovered. It can hardly, therefore, be said that any greater incitement for concealment is offered by the proposed legislation than by existing law. Under the proposed legislation as now, the concealment of a will will not operate beneficially, because whenever produced it can be probated. The proposed act in this respect makes absolutely no change in the existing law.

9. The next objection is indeed a surprising one. Of the many great defects of the existing system there are few greater than the absence of any provision for the appointment of an administrator pendente lite. A collector is authorized simply to collect and hold pending litigation the assets of the estate. But it is necessary that many other things should be done pendente lite, and generally throughout this country administrators pendente lite are appointed for that purpose. One very grave defect in the present law is this: A man dies owing a debt which is two years old. A dispute is begun over his will, and during this dispute a collector must be appointed, for the executor can not act under local law. But under local law a collector can not be sued. Now, in many cases the litigation over the will lasts more than a year and may last two or three years.

In the meantime the creditor's claim is absolutely barred by the statute of limitations, for when the will is finally established and an executor appointed, or disallowed, and an administrator appointed, the statute has run and the creditor is defeated if the personal representative chooses to plead the statute. If there were no other reason than this for the proposed legislation it would be sufficient, and it is strange that any one fully acquainted with this fact should object to a bill which proposes to remove this and other outworn evils a century old. Even admiration of the Maryland act of 1798 should not affect the judgment on this point, for even in Maryland a substantially similar provision for administration pendente lite was made many years ago. (See State vs. Craddock, 7 Harris & Johnson's Reports, page 40.)

10. It is suggested that a code is now being prepared. It is sufficient to say in response to this that Judge Cox, who is preparing the code referred to, recognizes the urgency of the proposed legislation, is strongly in its favor, and has expressed his approval of the amended bill reported by the committee. We do not see why a patient should be told that he must continue to suffer from a particular disease until some medicine can be discovered which will be a universal cure.

11. Finally, it is said in the letter referred to that the gravity of the situation as to titles of lands claimed through wills does not seem to be appreciated. The proposed legislation not only appreciates it, but seeks to remedy it; whereas Judge Hagner's proposal is that all of these troubles shall be indefinitely continued, and that in the meantime the people content themselves with a remedy which only professes to merely alleviate one of several great evils, instead of at once eradicating them all and putting the probate system of the District in line with those of the States of the Union.

So that it may be said that the entire bar of the District and the entire judiciary of the District favor the change, and the bar of the District and all the courts of the District, except Justice Hagner, favor the House bill. The matter has been very carefully considered by all the judges, and this particular bill recommended by the House has met their unqualified approval. The real object of the bill is to place in one court the entire jurisdiction with reference to the probating of wills, which as the law now stands permits two probates, one on personal and the other on real property, in reference to one will. This simplifies the matter, placing the entire jurisdiction in the supreme court of the District and making but one probate necessary.

I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PERMANENT SYSTEM OF HIGHWAYS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask present consideration of the bill H. R. 10209.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10209) to repeal an act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and all proceedings thereunder are hereby declared null and void, and the owners of land affected by such proceedings, whether by the laying out or the extension of streets or by the proposed abandonment of old streets, shall have hereafter the same free use and enjoyment of their land as though such proceedings had never been instituted: Provided, however, That no subdivision in said outside or unsubdivided part of the District of Columbia shall hereafter be permitted of public record unless approved by the Commissioners of said District as being in substantial conformity to the general plan of the city of Washington; and no street or highway in the aforesaid outside part of said District shall hereafter be extended or improved in any respect whatsoever at the public expense by grading, paving, lighting, sewering, or otherwise, where such street or highway does not substantially conform to said plan of the city of Washington.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to prohibit regulating the improvement of any street which was established prior to the year 1888.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a clause of the bill as it stands, before any substitutes or additions are offered. If the House will notice the concluding section of the bill, there are the following words:

And no street or highway in the aforesaid outside part of said District shall hereafter be extended or improved——

Mr. BABCOCK. My amendment covers that.

Mr. MUDD (reading). Here is the matter that I want to call attention to—in any respect whatsoever at the public expense by grading, lighting, sewering, or otherwise, where such street or highway does not substantially conform to said plan of the city of Washington.

Mr. BABCOCK. If you will listen to my amendment, you will see that it covers the entire point you make.

Mr. MUDD. Does your amendment provide for the continuance of the ordinary repairs?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly. If the gentleman would listen to the amendment, he would find that it applies where such streets or highways do not substantially conform to said plan of the city of Washington.

Mr. MUDD. I ask that the amendment be read again.

Mr. BABCOCK. It provides that it shall not interfere with any road or street laid out before 1888.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. PITNEY. I should like to ask a question as to the effect of the proposed amendment. I am in entire sympathy with the bill. I think that the highway act ought to be repealed. The proviso contained in the bill as reported is a very proper one. As I understand it, these outside streets or highways that were laid out at first were improvements of private property within the several subdivisions, and the proviso as reported to the House prevents the expenditure of public money upon these streets. The proviso which the gentleman's amendment would put in qualifies that to some extent. I should like to know what the extent would be.

Mr. BABCOCK. The purpose of the amendment is that those streets laid out prior to 1888, five years before this act was passed, shall not be affected by the act repealing that act, and that no money shall be expended on any street or any addition except those laid out prior to 1888 where the District has already been improving or spending money on these streets.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman's amendment does not in terms save those streets from future expenditure. It does not limit the expenditure to those streets on which an expenditure was made prior to 1888, but only to cases where the streets were laid out prior to 1888. These improvements may have been commenced for private benefit. Some of these streets have been laid out criss-cross, without any regard to the general plan of the city and for the benefit of private parties who wanted to make their lots salable; and it seems to me that we ought not to make any provision for the improvement of streets unless they shall have been made to conform to the general plan of the city of Washington.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will state to the gentleman that I was directed by the committee to offer that amendment simply for the purpose of protecting several streets that had been already improved and streets laid out more than ten years ago, and we provide for that in that portion of the bill which says:

And no street or highway in the aforesaid outside part of said District shall hereafter be extended or improved in any respect whatsoever at the public expense by grading, paving, lighting, sewering, or otherwise where such street or highway does not substantially conform to said plan of the city of Washington.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there may be no addition to the city but additions improved and platted, where the streets have been improved by the District and where this money has been spent, and this clause is simply inserted to protect those streets.

Mr. PITNEY. Will not the gentleman amend his amendment so that it shall apply only to those streets where the public money was expended prior to 1888?

Mr. BABCOCK. I will accept that.

Mr. PITNEY. That will be a very proper amendment to your amendment. I ask that the Clerk again report the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, so that I can offer an amendment to it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to prohibit regulating the improvement of any street established prior to the year 1888.

Mr. PITNEY. I move to amend by adding the words "and upon which public moneys were expended prior to the year 1888."

The Clerk read as follows:

And upon which public moneys were expended prior to said year.

Mr. BABCOCK. I accept the amendment and suggest that where it uses the word "streets" the words "or highways" be inserted.

Mr. PITNEY. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Wisconsin will be allowed to perfect his amendment.

There was no objection.

The question was taken; and the amendment of Mr. BABCOCK as modified was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, there is a desire on the part of some members of the House to call up what is known as the immune bill, and as some of the District committee desire to leave the city, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to call up District business immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that District business may be continued after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

VOLUNTEER BRIGADE OF ENGINEERS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 4468, to provide for a volunteer brigade of engineers and an additional force of 10,000 enlisted men specially accustomed to tropical climates.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in addition to the volunteer forces provided for by the act of April 22, 1898, entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," the President may authorize the Secretary of War to organize, under the terms and conditions of the aforesaid act, a volunteer brigade of engineers from the nation at large, to consist of not more than three regiments and not more than 3,500 men, possessing the special qualifications necessary for engineer troops, under such rules and regulations, including the appointment of the officers thereof, as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That not to exceed three officers of the Corps of Engineers of the Regular Army may hold volunteer commissions in any one regiment of the volunteer brigade of engineers at the same time: And provided further, That all officers shall be appointed by the President and with the consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. And the President is further empowered under the act of April 22, 1898, to authorize the Secretary of War to organize an additional volunteer force of not exceeding 10,000 enlisted men possessing immunity from diseases incident to tropical climates; the officers thereof to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, and that general debate run for forty minutes on a side, and then forty minutes be allowed for amendments to the bill, the gentleman from Tennessee to control forty minutes and I will control forty minutes, and then the bill be open for amendment for forty minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, it was agreed in committee that the opponents to the bill should have forty minutes and those in favor of the bill have forty minutes, and then we should go under the five-minute rule. There are only two sections in the bill. I do not feel as if I have a right to agree to bind any member of the House except in accordance with that agreement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asked that forty minutes' debate be allowed on a side and then the bill be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HULL. It was agreed in committee that we should make this arrangement: That we should have forty minutes for general debate, and I could have forty minutes additional if I desired it, and then the amendment should be concluded in forty minutes and have a vote taken at the expiration of two hours, which makes up the time. I ask unanimous consent of the House to ratify that agreement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks for the present consideration of the bill, and that forty minutes on each side be allowed for general debate, and then forty minutes be allowed for amendment and debate thereon. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will control forty minutes on that side and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] will control the forty minutes in opposition.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that I believe the House has a thorough comprehension of the bill now before it. The bill has been before the Congress for nearly four weeks. The House originally had before it what is known as the Wheeler bill, for the creation of a brigade of engineers. At the request of the War Department that was amended by providing 10,000 additional men to be enlisted, and the report to the House shows what it was for. I do not want to use the word "immunes," if I can help it, because it seems to be obnoxious to many members, and a good many insist that there is no such thing. I live in a country where we have none of the diseases incident to a tropical country. I learn, however, from those who claim to be experts, that a man who has had yellow fever is not likely to have it again, and is much more likely to be exempt from it than the man who has not had it could possibly be.

The bill we have called up does not provide that they shall be immune from yellow fever, but shall be, as far as it is possible to enlist them, immune from diseases incident to tropical climates. I think if it were an open question, I should be in favor of the bill reported to the House, amending the volunteer bill by striking out "three thousand" and inserting "sixteen thousand," so as to give the President the right to enlist in the nation at large men possessing the qualifications to the number of 16,000, with a little amendment in addition providing that the officers must be appointed by the President. As the bill was originally drawn, it provided for 3,000 men, but left it in the anomalous condition that the Secretary of War could appoint all the officers. I think nobody would be in favor of that proposition.

But it is not an original proposition. This matter has dragged along day after day and week after week until to-day the conditions are practically ripe to send a land force to Cuba. If we are going to utilize these men at all, it should be done at once. In addition to that, I will say to the House, so you may know my reason for advocating the passage of the Senate bill exactly as we have it before us, that on Saturday last the President of the United States and the Secretary of War both made a request of me that the House pass the Senate bill as it is. Not that they preferred it to the House bill, but it removes all question as to the enactment of the law and giving power for immediate action by the executive officers of the Government.

If we amend it and send it back, if we are to judge anything by the past, it means that we may have to wait and drag along day after day, and the Government not be able to utilize the force that the Government officers believe they will be able to utilize at an early possible day. As to whether these are immunes and can not have the disease again, that question has nothing to do with this. They are men that possess special advantages over other men, and the sooner they can go into action the better it is for the country at large. For that reason, at the request of the Secretary of War, I ask this House to pass the bill as it comes from the Senate, so that to-morrow morning, if necessary, they can begin to use the forces that this bill provides for.

The fact, of course, is not to be overlooked that some of my confrères on the committee oppose the bill—both the House bill and the Senate bill—on a different line. They believe that the President of the United States should not appoint the officers; that the appointments should be made by the governors of the States where the men are recruited. But, I ask the House to take notice, this bill does not apportion to any State a single regiment or company, but gives the President the right to recruit from the nation at large. Different parts of a regiment may be recruited from different States; for instance, a regiment of engineers may be recruited from New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania.

It is absolutely right and proper that the President of the United States, the Executive of the nation, should have the right to appoint the officers of any regiment and brigade that may be raised under this legislation. Under the volunteer bill we apportioned specifically to the States the regiments and gave to the respective governors the right to appoint the officers, the power of the governor being limited to that.

Mr. LOVE. I should like to ask a question for information. I represent a district bordering on the seacoast, where we have a great many immunes, because we have had the yellow fever there at different times. Now, we have an organized artillery company every member of which is an immune, and suppose this company is ready to volunteer under this bill, could they volunteer as a company, retaining their organization as such?

Mr. HULL. They would have to volunteer as individuals. But I will say to my friend that under the 3,000 act there has been no trouble about commissioning the officers. If the gentleman's State or district has a body of artillery, and the Government wants artillery, it will be very glad to take that company and muster the members into the service, but every man must volunteer as an individual. They are doing the same thing now under the volunteer act. They are volunteering as individuals, while the governors commission the officers. Under the 3,000 bill which has been spoken of, the men who enlisted in the companies have, I think, without exception, decided upon the officers that the President and the Secretary of War were to appoint.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANDY. As I understand the gentleman's explanation, this bill is intended to meet the present emergency; and yet as I read the bill, it will become a permanent measure. In any future war that may occur there will remain on the statute books this power of the President to raise and officer as a part of the Volunteer Army, in addition to the 3,000 men provided for in the act which we passed on the 22d of April, the 3,500 engineers that we hope to raise and these 10,000 additional troops who are to have immunity from diseases incident to a tropical climate. Now, in view of the fact that this bill is presented simply as an emergency measure to meet the present case, would the gentleman be willing to insert after the word "authorized," in line 7 of page 1, the words "during the present war;" and after the word "empowered," in the second section, the same words, so that this bill will apply to the present war only?

Mr. HULL. I do not yield for a speech. The gentleman can offer his amendment in due time. I shall not consent to it, for it would defeat the very object we have in view—to pass the bill as it comes from the Senate. Let me say to the gentleman further that I do not believe Congress is going to be out of session so long that we can not correct any part of this legislation which may seem hereafter to need amendment. And if another war should arise——

Mr. HANDY. Why should we make provision for that now?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman's proposition can be presented and debated under the five-minute rule.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, if we can get the attention of the House to what is proposed here, I do not think we shall have any trouble in coming to a sensible conclusion. In the volunteer bill passed by this House it was settled after a strenuous fight that the officers of the volunteer organizations should be selected by the governors of the respective States. That, of course, meant that each State should furnish its own pro rata of men. That bill contained a clause authorizing the President of the United States to call out 3,000 men not subject to the qualification that they should be pro rated among the States, and of that organization the officers were to be selected and appointed by the President.

When the call for volunteers was made, apportionments were made among the States, which responded—the Southern States, the Western States, all the States—far in excess of the number of troops required, a result most gratifying to everybody. Now, the proposition is—and when it is distinctly understood, I do not believe gentlemen on the other side will support it—to call out 10,000 instead of 3,000 men and to specify in the call that after you have organized a brigade of engineers, the rest shall be men who have had the yellow fever and are not subject to the diseases of the tropics.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, as to the 10,000 men that you propose to call out by this bill, you make provision for officering them in a very different way from that provided in the late volunteer bill. You officer them not by the President of the United States, but by the President "with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Now, I do not hesitate to give my support to a call for all of the men and to provide all of the means that are necessary in this conflict. I do not hesitate to make provision to fight the battles of the country, and to use every energy and every dollar that we may need to bring the war to a speedy termination.

But I want to put it to the good judgment of any man on this floor when I ask this question: Why should you call out 10,000 "immunes," as it is proposed to call them, and which must necessarily be confined to four or five States of the South where the yellow fever prevails, or has prevailed in the past? Why call them out, and at the same time take from them the right to recommend their own officers to the governors of their States for appointment? Why do you not place them exactly upon the same footing as the enlisted men from the other States where yellow fever does not prevail? Is it a crime to have the yellow fever, and for that reason that the men must be punished and treated differently from the other volunteers in the service? Do you escape responsibility by saying to them that it is a condition of affairs that is somewhat peculiar, and therefore that you are going to give them a different organization?

Why, Mr. Speaker, every man knows when you undertake to organize these troops that they must come as an absolute necessity from four to five of the different States in the South.

Now, we have furnished our quota. We are ready to do more than that. We have more than our quota ready at this very moment, organized, completed, and compact, ready for the service. If you want more we will give them. But yet when you go South, as in this case, and call for the enlistment of these men, these "immunes," you undertake to deprive them of the right to serve under their own officers. Is that right? Is that just? What excuse can there possibly be for it? Why this provision?

If they are to be governed by officers selected by the United States—these men must come from the State of Tennessee, Louisiana, a portion of Arkansas, Florida, and Mississippi practically. Now, I ask you again, Is that the way to deal with a great question of this kind, and to force these men to go into the service under a set of officers not selected by themselves, and thus give an entirely separate and different privilege to men who enlisted from the same State or the adjacent States who are also volunteers? If a regiment is organized and composed of men who have had the yellow fever, what right have you to say to them that the Government should, without any consent of their own, commission the colonels, the majors, the captains, and lieutenants? Where is the justice of that?

I am simply calling attention, Mr. Speaker, to what seems to me to be a matter of justice. I do it in no spirit of criticism, except that in my judgment, in a case of this kind, absolute justice should be done to all. We will furnish you the men. There is no trouble about that. We will furnish you our quota and vastly more than our quota. We will furnish you with the men as far as we can furnish anything to fight the war with. But all we ask is that the whole country and every State shall stand upon an equal footing. [Applause.]

That is all that we ask. It is not very much. If you draw especially on the Southern States for a class of men to fight the battles of the country, we do not complain, but we ask you in all candor and frankness that you should treat them precisely as you have treated the volunteers in other parts of the country. Why treat a man from South Carolina different from one from Maine? All stand on the same footing. Certainly it is not the intention of the Government to treat the people of the Southern States in an unjust manner in a question of this kind. [Applause.]

Now, again, I ask is it right here because a man has had the misfortune to have the yellow fever, or to live in a climate that is at times subjected to that dread disease, is it right to punish him for that misfortune?

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another point to which I wish to call attention, and I do it with the utmost frankness and make no political point on it whatever, but I can only call it to the attention of the House, because I believe that when these matters are understood there will be uniform and exact justice done to all sections of the country. I do not hesitate about calling attention to these things because I know the spirit that animates the members here.

Suppose, for instance, I go to New Orleans to-day and find a mustering or enlisting officer, and here steps up a white man named Bill Jones, who wants to enlist, and says, "I am an immune." Now, you have no way on earth to find out whether that is true or not. You can not tell whether he has ever had the yellow fever. The next man perhaps who comes up is a colored man, and he says, "I also am an immune." What will you do with these men? What provision can you make for their examination? I ask you, therefore, in all candor and all frankness, to leave this matter to the governors of the States. They will furnish the men for you.

Now, this is not a criticism about who shall appoint officers, in one sense of the word; but you should remember, and we all know it to be a fact, that you can never fight a volunteer force effectively or with absolute success unless they are subject to the commands of their own officers. The thing never has been done and never will be done.

Now, there is one other criticism not very material. Under the bill provision is made that the officers shall be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. How can this be done, I ask you, if you want to put this force rapidly into the field? You say that this is an emergency measure, and yet you provide a roundabout way of performing one of the most essential features of the bill. How long will it take to get these men commissioned? Why not follow the rule laid down in the volunteer bill passed a few weeks ago giving to the governors of the States the right to commission their captains, lieutenants, majors, lieutenant-colonels, and colonels. Is there any reason for treating differently these men, who are likely to be free from yellow fever, from other classes of men who have already enlisted? All of them are volunteers, and all of them should be treated exactly alike.

One other thing, and I ask this in candor and fairness, does it seem right to call on four or five of the States of the South for the 10,000 or more men recommended by the present bill? Is that the right way to treat us? If you are going to bring out this force, and I agree that it ought to be brought out, let them at least have the full privilege of naming their officers. You never will have any trouble about the Southern States discharging their duty, but you should not require four or five of the Southern States to furnish 10,000 men and then deprive them of the right of recommending their own officers. Why do you do it?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have expressed my feelings about it. In the western portion of my State the yellow fever raged terribly in 1878. It devastated that whole region. I know substantially the men there, and some of the best military characters we have have had the yellow fever. I repeat again, why not let these boys who have had the yellow fever organize their commands, as we did the volunteers, and treat them just as you have treated the volunteers? I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HULL. Does the gentleman from Tennessee want to yield to anybody?

Mr. COX. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HULL. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-one minutes.

Mr. HULL. Well, I reserved only thirty minutes for myself in order to bring a vote at 3 o'clock, but the gentleman from Tennessee had forty minutes. That would give me twenty-one minutes.

Mr. HANDY. The unanimous consent was for forty minutes on a side.

Mr. HULL. I know, but I am not compelled to use it. If the gentleman insists that it was given to the House, I am not compelled to use it on this side. I do not know of anyone among those who are in favor of the bill who desires to discuss it. If so, I shall be glad to yield; if not, I ask some one to go ahead with the debate.

Mr. HAY. With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee I should like to address a few remarks to the House upon the bill.

Mr. COX. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman.

Mr. HAY. If any other gentleman desires to speak against the bill, I will yield to him.

Mr. Speaker, I have looked at this bill, as I have endeavored to look at every bill of this character, from a business standpoint. I do not regard this bill as one which can possibly be considered in a partisan sense at all. I think every measure that is introduced here for the purpose of carrying on this war should be regarded from a business standpoint and from a patriotic standpoint. In the first place, it seems to me that the great victory which has been won by that brilliant sailor, Commodore Dewey, renders it very questionable as to whether or not we need any more volunteers.

Again, I believe that the President, under the volunteer bill, has a right to call out any number of men he may see fit. Now, the principal objection which I have to this bill is that the officers who are appointed by the President are appointed not for the war, but for all time. If any gentleman will examine the provisions of this bill, he will find that, while the enlisted men are appointed for the war, there is no limitation fixed upon the appointment of the officers. That is true of both the first and second sections of the bill, in the brigade of engineers and in the immunes. I think that ought not to be so.

I think that these officers ought, like the enlisted men, to go out at the same time that the volunteers go out and that the increase of officers of the Regular Army go out. I do not think there ought to be any question about that. Gentlemen may say that this bill is not liable to that construction. I say that it is liable to it, and very much so, and the English language is not so poor but that these gentleman can so word the bill as to make it read in such a way that there can be no doubt whatever upon a question of that sort.

Mr. MORRIS. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it your idea that the officers in these regiments should be appointed by the governors of the States, as in the other volunteer regiments?

Mr. HAY. I was coming to that. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Well, now, if that is your idea, I quite agree with you about it, if it is practicable; but will you please explain how it would be practicable to do that?

Mr. HAY. I am coming to that. First I wanted to say that these officers appointed by the President would continue officers after the end of this war, under the same plan that we had in time of peace, before this war began. There were then in each infantry regiment two skeleton companies, as they are called, which had officers, but had no men, and, as I said before, this bill upon that point can be made entirely plain. Now, I think these officers ought to be selected by the men and appointed by the governors of the States from which they are drawn.

The gentleman from Minnesota asks me if that is practicable. I say it is. It is a well-known fact that these immunes, as they are called, come from three or four States. It is an acknowledged fact that 5,000 of these 10,000 men must come from the State of Louisiana, if you get them at all. So that I say, so far as 5,000 of them are concerned, certainly the officers of those men coming from the State of Louisiana should be selected by their men and commissioned by the governor of Louisiana.

I understand that there is a gentleman in this city now who already has raised a regiment of these immunes and has offered their services to the President. Now, if there are any other States that can raise as much as a battalion, or as much as a company, even, let those battalions and those companies form themselves into a regiment and the men themselves will very readily agree as to which of the governors of the States shall appoint the colonels and officers. These governors will appoint the men whom the men have chosen to command themselves, and I say, as my colleague from Tennessee said a moment ago, that these volunteer troops which are authorized to be called from the United States at large should have the same privilege and the same right to be officered by their friends, their comrades, and their neighbors as have the volunteer troops of the State which the President has called out. You say this is impracticable. I understand that in some States the call has been so small that in calling out 125,000 men there were not enough to make up a regiment, and yet the governor of the State appointed the officers for the battalion or two companies or whatever it might be.

Now, as to the question of immunes, I venture to say that there is not a man on this floor who can produce any authority from any medical source as to whether there are "immunes."

I understand that there is a gentleman in the Senate who has had yellow fever twice. I understand there is a gentleman on the floor of this House who has had yellow fever twice. I understand that it may be—possibly from hearsay evidence and not from any medical source—that a man who has had yellow fever is not as apt to have it as one who has not, but I understand from all sides that a man who has had yellow fever in Louisiana is just as apt to go to Havana and have it there as if he had never had it at all. Now, about these immunes. There is going to be a contention about that. How are you going to tell? What authority is going to pronounce on these immunes?

I could go to Louisiana, if I wanted to do it, and so could any gentleman in this House, and say, "I have had yellow fever," and enlist as an "immune." Now, what is the purpose of having 10,000 immunes? It is to shield the lives of other soldiers who have not had yellow fever, and which come from portions of this country where yellow fever does not prevail. I am willing and ready to give my adherence to that principle if you can get immunes; but if you can not get them, if there is no certainty about it, if these people are just as apt to have yellow fever, is it necessary, and how are you going to manage it?

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will permit me, I would state that it is not suggested that the immunes shall be required to capture Cuba. Other people will have to go, and they are ready.

Mr. HAY. Why do you want immunes?

Mr. STEELE. I do not want them. I am with you.

Mr. HAY. I say I agree with the gentleman from Indiana that the people of this country do not want to sacrifice, perhaps, the lives of a certain class of people for the benefit of other people. I say that the whole country is ready to do its duty in this matter. Now, it seems to me that this bill gives the President four hundred and forty-odd officers——

Mr. COX. Eight hundred.

Mr. HAY. Eight hundred officers to be appointed by him. I say that it seems to me that there is no authority presented here for calling people immunes.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to call his attention to the fact that there are 50 officers to a regiment; that will make about 800 officers. Now, I want gentlemen on the other side to tell what is to become of those 800 officers after the war, under this bill.

Mr. HAY. I have just stated that the construction of this bill can be such as to provide that the officers shall remain in the Army without any troops to command. Now, there is no question about that. If gentlemen want to correct their bill in that respect, they ought to do it. I say the Government is going to be imposed upon in the matter of the organization of this brigade or division of immunes. There will be plenty of men in the State of Louisiana who will go and volunteer and say that they are immunes when they are no more immunes than you or I. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the passage of this bill in its present shape; but I want to be distinctly understood that I am not opposed to giving the President the right to call out every man that he deems necessary in this war for the overthrow of the power of Spain and to vote for every measure that is a proper and necessary measure in order that this war may be soon ended. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COX. Under the suggestion I made to the Speaker, I think I have twelve minutes left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifteen minutes.

Mr. COX. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, there is no member of this House who will refuse to support every measure necessary to carry to a speedy and triumphant termination the contest in which the United States are now engaged. So far as this side of the Chamber is concerned there will be no partisanship. This does not mean that members are to be foreclosed from opposing improper measures and seeking to defeat vicious legislation. Under the plea of necessity, or emergency, or patriotism, speaking for myself, I am not willing to be driven into the support of propositions which I regard as hostile to the best interests of the American people or unnecessary and unwise.

I am opposed to this bill. No valid reasons have been offered in its behalf. The objections urged by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] conclusively establish that most of its provisions are utterly indefensible. It is crude and uncertain. It confers authority upon the President which ought to be exercised either by the governors of the States from which the troops are to be drawn or by the troops after enlistment. It is violative of the theory controlling the selection of volunteers. It will enable the President to give place and office to hundreds. It is a bill to furnish offices for persons who are unwilling to serve their country as privates. It is ambiguous and uncertain in the provisions relating to the tenure of service. Can it be designed to furnish secure positions after the present war is ended to many who now have no active station?

In addition to the manifold objections of a similar character it is objectionable at present because unnecessary. I will willingly give my vote for men and money enough to conduct this war. But are more men now required? We have the standing army. In addition, we have 125,000 volunteers authorized by preceding legislation, and we have our splendid Navy with its valorous men.

In the light of present events, can it be contended that all these forces are insufficient for the contest before us? Is there anything in the condition of Cuba, or the Spanish troops in the Island of Cuba, that gives evidence of a necessity for a larger Army than that which has already been called into existence?

Upon the Island of Cuba to-day there are not 40,000 Spanish soldiers fit for active service. It is a fact, cognizant to those who have visited Cuba and to those who have acquainted themselves with the condition of affairs in that stricken island, that the Spanish forces have been decimated. The hundreds of thousands have melted away and, as stated, less than 40,000 are in a condition for active warfare.

General Weyler while there plundered and despoiled his own troops, and often visited upon them the same sorrows, privation, and suffering that was accorded the reconcentrados. Levies fresh from Spain were placed in swamps and small forts and then neglected. In their isolation they were deprived of food and nourishment. Without sufficient food and deprived of medical attendance, is it to be wondered at that thousands lost heart and courage and went miserably to premature graves? Starvation and criminal neglect upon the part of Weyler and his officers depleted the Spanish armies. The soldiers now surviving are unprepared for war. They are not fit to engage with a force such as we have already authorized to land on the Island of Cuba.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that we exaggerate the work undertaken and the contest upon which we have entered. One would think from the noise that is being made that we were contending with the greatest power on earth instead of an effete, exhausted nation. One would think that we were about to engage with a colossal army instead of a few ragged, half-starved soldiers that are to-day found on the Island of Cuba. I make this assertion, and I challenge contradiction of it, in the light of all the facts, that if we had landed 25,000 men on the Island of Cuba two weeks ago and delivered to the insurgents sufficient arms to thoroughly equip them, and adequate rations for their maintenance, and had employed our fleet before Havana and Matanzas, these cities before this time would have fallen and the Stars and Stripes would have been floating over Morro Castle and the Spanish flag driven from the island.

What is the necessity of increasing the Army? We have now available 150,000 troops. Are not these sufficient to secure the freedom of Cuba and to continue whatever warfare may be necessary in the Orient in order to supply Commodore Dewey whatever may be essential to subjugate the Philippines and maintain law and order over that far-away land? There is no necessity for sending to Cuba more than 50,000 men. It must be apparent to all that the end is in sight; that with starvation threatening, our fleets surrounding, and our troops ready and impatient to embark, the overthrow of Spain's authority is near at hand. The Spanish troops will soon surrender. I feel confident that if we supply to the insurgents adequate munitions of war and immediately employ 25,000 of our soldiers against the Spanish troops and utilize our ships to destroy the ocean fortifications at Havana and elsewhere, there will be no necessity for augmenting our fleet or increasing our Army. Therefore this bill is unnecessary.

What is the necessity of adding 12,000 or 15,000 more men to the Army now? When it becomes apparent, if it shall, that our Army is inadequate to compete with these half-starved and ragged soldiers on the Island of Cuba, it will be time enough to pass a measure through Congress increasing the Army of the United States. I say now it is a work of supererogation to add to the Army of the United States. It seems to me that we are discrediting our own troops, discrediting their bravery, their power and ability when we doubt that 150,000 of them, aided by the powerful fleets that we have, are unable to compete with Spain's already vanquished armies and drive forever from Cuba our unworthy, infamous foe which has so accursed and blighted the New World. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FLEMING. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOVE].

Mr. LOVE. Mr. Speaker, there are two artillery companies in my district that are immunes. They are well organized, and all of them have had the yellow fever. They can not enlist under the volunteer act. Now, they would like to come in under this bill, but they wish to retain the company organization. They do not wish to volunteer as individuals; they would like to join as a company organization. This bill proposes, however, that the troops shall be collected from different parts of the country. Perhaps no State will furnish as much as a regiment. It looks to me, therefore, impracticable to carry out the idea advanced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] that the regimental officers should be appointed by the governors of the respective States.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. LOVE. Certainly.

Mr. COX. It does not follow that a regiment is to come from one State; it does not follow that a company should come from one State.

Mr. LOVE. If that be true, then how can you provide that the officers are to be named by the governors when the regiment may represent several States? These artillery companies are composed of young men who have been raised on the coast and are acclimated, and I am satisfied that they would render valuable service in this particular emergency.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman permit me a moment? Did I understand him to say that he had in his district two artillery companies?

Mr. LOVE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAY. Let me say to the gentleman that the idea of this bill is that at least 10,000 of these men shall be infantry.

Mr. HULL. I do not think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] has any authority for saying that. They are to be such troops as the Government may need to use.

Mr. HAY. We all know they will be infantry.

Mr. LOVE. I understand, from the reading of this bill, that the President may use these artillery companies. I do not think, from the language of this measure, that they would be debarred or prohibited from coming in. But I know they would like to come in under their present organization, if possible, as companies; and I take it the President might even recognize the officers of those companies in his appointments.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the gentleman think there is any such thing as an immune from yellow fever?

Mr. LOVE. While occasionally there are persons who have yellow fever the second time, yet, as a general rule, the gentleman must know that when a man has had yellow fever once he is not nearly so subject to it and is regarded as an immune. There are only rare instances in which a man has it the second time, and it is generally in a milder form.

Mr. SIMPSON. It has been indicated here that a man may have yellow fever in Mississippi, for instance, and escape, yet if he goes to Cuba, where the climate is different, he may take the fever again just as readily as one who has never had it at all.

Mr. LOVE. That is a disputed question. I know that some leading physicians hold to that theory, while others do not; therefore I am in doubt as to that. But I do know that people who have lived on the coast of Mississippi, Florida, or Louisiana can naturally stand the climate of Cuba better than persons who have been raised farther north; they would not be so subject to disease as Northern people. But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, as has been stated by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING], that we are not properly utilizing the army already called out.

The very purpose for which this war was declared, if we are to judge from the President's message and the declaration of Congress, was to relieve the reconcentrados and prevent them from dying of starvation. It was a war to be waged for humanity's sake. I must say that I never would have voted for this war except for that purpose. Yet three weeks have passed and up to this time the course that has been pursued by this Government is calculated to assist the Spaniards in starving out the reconcentrados in the Island of Cuba, because by blockading the island and forbidding the introduction of supplies the reconcentrados will be the first to suffer and thus defeat the main purpose of the war. Then why not turn our arms on Cuba rather than on other Spanish possessions. No doubt hundreds are perishing there every day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOVE. I would like just two minutes more.

Mr. HULL. I have not two minutes more to yield to the gentleman.

I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest and some surprise to the arbitrary statements which have been made in the discussion of this measure, particularly those of some gentlemen who, being perfectly sincere and honest in their suggestions, are yet entirely in error not only with respect to the purpose of this bill, but with respect to its effect.

Mr. Speaker, no man who has not been himself a part of the South, who has not inhabited the tropical or semitropical region and witnessed with his own eyes and experienced in his own person the evil effects of what is known in the South as the yellow-fever epidemic, can have any proper conception of the enormous advantage of having an immune corps in the Island of Cuba in the present condition of affairs.

I heard the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING] speak of heroism and courage and valor. Who here or anywhere has any conception of the proper method of meeting an insidious and hidden foe? A man may be as brave as man can be when called on to go out into the open and fight, but every man naturally desires to keep away from a hidden and unknown enemy such as this insidious disease is recognized to be. And I warn this House that if we fail to pass a bill ingrafting into the Army of our country a body of men who are immunes from the diseases incident to that tropical climate there will come hereafter a sense of profound regret that we did not accept the opportunity to send such men to the front as a part of the army of occupation. This dread disease has power to fell more men than all the bullets of Spaniards that we may meet in the Island of Cuba, and if we fail to do our duty to the American Army in providing a large number of American soldiers who are absolutely immune from this disease, we shall be responsible for consequences which no man in this House would willingly assume now or hereafter.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am at the gentleman's service.

Mr. HUNTER. Do you not think——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAWLEY] has expired.

Mr. HULL. I yield one minute more that the question may be asked and answered.

Mr. HUNTER. Does not the gentleman from Texas think it would be much better to arm Cubans who are already on the island and accustomed to the climate—to provide, we will say, 10,000 or 20,000 of them with American arms at once, and let them take the chances of the climate—than to send troops from this country?

Mr. HAWLEY. Has not that already been provided for under the bill passed this morning?

Mr. HUNTER. If so, then we do not need this bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. That may depend upon circumstances. We have agreed to establish a stable government in Cuba; and the time will come perhaps when we shall need to take care of somebody there besides the people who are in arms against each other, and for myself I will agree that the integrity and reputation and the good faith of our country should be safeguarded under the watchful care and protection of American troops, and whoever else may fight under our banner must be guided and directed and controlled by the policy and purpose of this Government, and by this alone.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. With pleasure.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Do you not think that the "immunes," who have passed through the yellow fever and who are willing to tender their services to the Government in a case of this kind, should be placed at least upon the same footing with other troops and allowed the poor privilege of selecting their own officers?

Mr. HAWLEY. Replying directly to the question of the gentleman from Mississippi, I will state to him only this, as an illustration: That in the district I have the honor to represent, to-day we have a regiment, organized and equipped, and which is ready to be sent wherever the Government desires it to go without the imposition of any conditions whatever.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Oh, well; they can get in under the bill already passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. You are wholly in error; they could come in under this bill only.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, heretofore I have witnessed similar exhibitions to that which we are now witnessing in the Hall of the House, where gentlemen seemed to be impressed with the idea that they could manage great war affairs better than those to whom that express duty is committed by the law and the Constitution. I have heard to-day gentlemen say in this discussion that if "certain things" had been done thirty days ago, certain things would have been accomplished now, and that certainly a condition of affairs would have been presented to our people very different from that which confronts us.

Now, I would ask these gentlemen who is, under our law, intrusted with the responsibility of the conduct of a war? You ask to have our Navy go to work and bombard the forts on the Island of Cuba, while Spain has a great and powerful fleet on the ocean, yet exactly where is not known. Our ships are to be subjected to risk, and be crippled, possibly, before the Spanish fleet is destroyed.

Mr. Speaker, there are agents of this Government—men in high positions—who are charged with the responsibility of conducting this war.

I think they have planned one battle and have won one victory, which is of so momentous and vital an importance not only to the United States, but to the whole civilized world, that we can allow them to manage and carry on the war without undertaking to interfere with or hamper their movements or their actions. [Applause.]

But I have seen this same condition of affairs before. I remember a period, some thirty-five years ago—I refer to the war period from 1861 to 1865—when the same conditions prevailed; and I have seen members of Congress on the floor of this House—men who possibly had never seen an army and certainly could not have maneuvered one—who understood better than the Commander in Chief of the United States forces just what should be done, and were not slow in stating what they believed ought to be done. Then they were telling us of the tremendous victories that "could be gained" if certain things were done or had been done in their way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to believe that the men whose duty it is to look after our interests in war, as far as our Navy and Army are concerned, are men who are quite as well prepared and qualified to do that work properly as the men who sit on this floor, most of whom will not claim, I apprehend, to be entirely familiar with the movements of either armies or navies. And I do not mean in this to make any reflection upon any member of this body. It is not a reflection upon their patriotism, nor is it a reflection upon their ability. But the Constitution has fixed the men who are the executive force in conducting this war, and I think they are quite competent to do it.

I do not believe that the House of Representatives, either singly or combined, can manage a great war with another great nation, on land or sea, as well as those who are charged by the Constitution with the responsibility for its conduct. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, if the second section of this bill would give immunity to all the volunteer soldiers, or all of the soldiers who are going to Cuba, it would be a matter of great satisfaction to me, and I would vote for it without a moment's delay. But it is not proposed that it shall be so. We have called into the service of the Government 125,000 volunteers from the various States, and every one of them is supposed to go to Cuba, if his services there shall be required. Now, if, instead of all of these men, there be sent 10,000 "immunes" to Cuba, according to the suggestions made on this floor, we will accomplish just as much as by sending the volunteers now called out. That is to say, by sending 10,000 men who are free from yellow fever into the island we can readily capture it. I would gladly say "Amen" to the proposition. Or even if it were proposed to enlist 10,000 men as nurses for our Army who will go to Cuba and care for our volunteer soldiers, I would again say "Amen," and willingly.

But that is not the proposition that confronts us now. It is proposed here, gravely, that the President of the United States—who is not asking us, so far as I have heard, for this legislation—that the President of the United States may select certain officers to raise regiments of men who are supposed to have immunity from the yellow fever which prevails in certain seasons in Cuba.

In the State of Indiana there are to-day 100,000 men ready—and we can add any number to that if you want them—men who are ready and anxious to take the chances, not only of the yellow fever, but of battles either in the Navy or in the Army, and they have a right to go in proper proportion under the call of the President. Why, then, in view of that fact, should a few favored ones have a special opportunity, that which is not granted to all other volunteers, especially where all are anxious to go? So far as I am individually concerned I do not want to go at all. [Laughter.] I have had all of the battles and all of the hardships and all of the dangers I want to encounter. The battle itself would be enough to keep me away [laughter], and the yellow fever would be an additional impediment to my enlistment. [Laughter and applause.]

I have patriotism to spare, but I have not as much courage as I ought to have to go to Cuba and do battle. My constituents are better than I am in this direction. They are anxious to go and do battle for their country to show that they have patriotism. Who believes that we will get a thousand immunes who want to go to do battle? Why, if I had had the yellow fever once, I should be worse scared about it than I am now. [Laughter.] Seriously, however, I am informed by a reconcentrado of this House from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], who has recently been in Cuba, that there is not the danger from yellow fever that is generally supposed. By keeping on the high lands and by observing hygienic laws, you are comparatively free from yellow fever. If you go there to battle, you go there because you have your heart in the cause and desire to wipe out the Spaniards. I am full of that desire, and will overcome my fear if my services are necessary.

Mr. CUMMINGS. A man who has faced the Confederates need never be afraid of facing Spaniards. [Applause.]

Mr. STEELE. Well, then, maybe I will go.

Mr. HULL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. Before the gentleman from Iowa takes his seat, I should like to ask him a question. Some gentlemen on this side of the House are laboring under the impression that the officers who shall be appointed under this measure may hold their positions after the war and be incorporated into the Regular Army under this bill. I do not understand that to be the case.

Mr. HULL. That is not the policy of the Department, and no man connected with the advocacy of this bill has that idea.

Mr. COX. What does the bill say?

Mr. HULL. I do not think the bill would permit it. This is an addition to the volunteer force, and they would be compelled to comply with the law involving the volunteers.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It says they shall be organized under the conditions of the act which we passed the other day, does it not?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. COX. They are not organized under the volunteer bill. It is an organization in addition to the volunteer bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words about this measure. I should much prefer that this bill should correspond, in the method of organization feature, to the act to which it is proposed to be supplemental—that is to say, that the officers shall be selected by the men, and that they may be commissioned, if you please, by the President, provided, however, that those who are to be appointed shall have the privilege of selecting those who are to command them. They know them best.

But in regard to the necessity of this measure, I know what the yellow fever is. My colleague who represents the Galveston district [Mr. HAWLEY] said very truly that men will fight in the open field against overwhelming odds, but when it comes to disease, that a man can not defend himself against, there are very few of us who like to be so situated. I know what yellow fever is. It is a most fearful disease, and, unless conditions for its proper treatment be altogether favorable, it is generally fatal. A gentleman on this side of the House has said, "Why not arm the Cubans?" I do not think it wise to depend upon the Cubans, or on any other people except our own, to maintain the honor of our flag and the integrity of our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. You voted for the bill this morning, however.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly I did.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But as an auxiliary.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, as suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi, as an auxiliary. Mr. Speaker, no man can foresee the course of events. No man can predict the future—not even what a single day may bring forth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. I yield one minute more. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will determine that.

Mr. SAYERS. If it should become necessary to maintain an army of occupation in Cuba, I would have that army composed of citizens of the United States, owing allegiance to our Government, acting in the interest of our Government, representing its integrity and defending its honor, and I am not willing to commit its cause to any other people on earth. But, sir, I would much prefer to have this measure so amended that those who freely and voluntarily give their services to their country should be permitted to select their officers, to be commissioned by the President.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I ask my friend from Iowa a question before he proceeds?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Would not the gentleman be willing to strike out these words:

the officers thereof to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—and to substitute for them the words—

the President may appoint the officers thereof, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, subject to the provisions of the bill passed April 22, 1898—making the regimental officers of these immunes receive their appointments exactly as the volunteer officers are appointed under the bill passed April 22?

Mr. HULL. That provided that they should be appointed by the governors of the States.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I do not want the officers of these regiments and companies appointed by anybody. I want the men to elect them, and then that they shall be commissioned by the President.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time, and will let the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] conclude now.

Mr. HAY. How can we do any such thing as that suggested by the gentleman from Texas? It can not be done under the Constitution.

Mr. SAYERS. I will answer the gentleman when I can get the floor.

Mr. COX. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, my attitude toward measures of this nature has been well defined by me. When I opposed another measure of this sort some time since, because I believed it sought to put the volunteer guards under the control of the Regular Army, and prevented the volunteer organizations from having any life, I was very generally criticised throughout the country, and by many of the papers, which did not appreciate the evil of the measure. The New York Sun and the Washington Post had been holding me up with severe excoriation, and the Sun has presented me daily as a thing of beauty and a joy forever. [Laughter.] I am not in any way criticising or condemning the exercise of free criticism on the part of those eminent journals. It is sufficient for me to say to them that whenever I see any measure brought into the House that has for its purpose the destruction of the National Guards, and which would prevent the governors of the States from exercising their sovereign rights under the Constitution, I shall fight it, and shall not care who criticises my conduct. This particular bill is subject, in my opinion, to the same criticism I passed on the former measure, and it ought to be at once condemned; and I rise to give grounds for its defeat. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Mr. Speaker, I trust I may not be held responsible for the lack of dignity and decorum which gentlemen on the other side are displaying.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will see that the gentleman is not held responsible for that. The House will be in order.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman from Utah, who, from his personal experience of the volunteer forces in Cuba, suggests that none of the forces provided for in this bill will be needed there. I do not know whether they will be needed or not, but I venture the prophecy that if the next naval engagement shall not terminate this war, and this land force shall for any reason be required, it will mean that this country has entered upon a continental conflict.

This is not a new epoch; it may be a new era. You may remember its precedent began as early as 1767, when Sir William Draper in behalf of England invaded the Philippines and through Admiral Cornish, the Dewey of his day, bombarded and captured Manila.

This event was urged by Murray, later Mansfield, as the end of the complication. But intervening events continued the strife until it closed in 1805 with the memorable Trafalgar. It is also known, Mr. Speaker, that Napoleon Bonaparte entered upon his conflicts to subjugate a small Austrian province, but internal complications forced the generation into a war of worlds, only to end with Waterloo. It may be we have finally entered upon such a conflict; but whether that be so or not, we can only leave the undeveloped time to disclose.

But it is stated, as is apparent, that no such condition now exists. If that be so, why should this measure be introduced? Why give this increased number of troops, and provide that the organization shall be under the authority of the President, refusing to the governors of States the right to exercise the power which both the law and the Constitution have ever placed in them; refusing to the governors the right to name any of the officers, even the lieutenants, captains, and colonels of regiments; giving complete control to the President and denying to the State the proper supervision over and the proper exercise of the National Guards of the States?

This bill calls into use a certain class of men who are represented as having immunity from disease. Gentlemen, who decides upon this question as to whether they have this immunity or not? Then is it immunity from what disease? "Diseases incident to the Tropics?" Who shall be the judge of this thing? What diseases—fever, scurvy, intestinal complications, or any complaint that one may have had in any land under the sun? That is all left to the discretion of some person unnamed in the bill—any person who may use this excuse to discriminate against the West. The evil will gradually permeate the system until it will have a culmination in the destruction of the National Guard by appointing only men who claim to have been in war—the Confederate ex-soldiers only, or any other set of men who claim immunity from anything as an excuse to be favored—thus creating a standing army under the supreme control of the President.

The bill dishonors and distracts those volunteer forces so necessary to encourage if we would hope ever to preserve the honor and dignity of our country. For these reasons and others that my friend from Tennessee [Mr. COX] and my friend from Virginia [Mr. HAY] have given, I shall oppose this measure and hope that it may be defeated. [Applause.] I now ask that Colonel MARSH, of Illinois, supplement my objections if he is so inclined, as I gather from his present views heretofore expressed.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the gentleman remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has two minutes.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will exhaust his time, I think we may proceed with the bill without any further delay.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia for the two minutes.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say that this is not a question, as I understand it, of furnishing men, but it is a question of the method by which they shall be furnished. The 125,000 were supplied in a day and a night, and the States of this Union are ready to supply another 125,000 in twenty-four hours; men who are ready and willing to expose themselves, as the gentleman from Indiana said, not only to Spanish bullets, but to yellow fever or any other fever. Why not let this bill be prepared exactly like the volunteer bill?

Why not, if we need more men, allow the governors of the States to furnish more men and name their officers. They are ready throughout the United States to take all the chances of war; not only ready, but anxious. Some say there are 600,000 and some say there are 1,000,000 who have tendered their services. It seems to me that we ought to follow along the lines of the bill which we have already passed, instead of switching off and making special provision for a few thousand men, apparently to make places for 800 officers. No good reason has been offered why this bill should depart from the lines of the other bill, and no good reason has been offered why we should not trust the governors of the States to name the officers. Therefore I oppose the bill, and I propose to oppose it, and shall vote against it until it is modified and made in keeping with the other bill that has already been passed.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. It has been stated on this side of the House that the men at the close of the war would be mustered out, while the officers would be retained.

Mr. HULL. The officers and men will both be mustered out.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman object to a provision in the bill which will make that plain?

Mr. HULL. It is already plain; there can be no doubt about it. Now, I want to add a few words in answer to the objections of the gentleman who has just taken his seat. We have 125,000 men ready to go into the field, and more than 125,000 men who have offered to go, but are not ready. They are not yet organized. They are not ready to be mustered in. Examinations are cutting down the men, and they are not ready to immediately go into the Army. I want to say further that as far as the appointment of the officers of the regiment is concerned, the wishes of the men will be consulted just as much by the President in appointing them as if the governors of the States themselves appointed them. The bill we passed did not say that the governors should appoint the officers elected by the men, but they might appoint them; it left it in the governors' discretion.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HULL. With pleasure.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Are the volunteers under this bill to be mustered out as soon as the war is over?

Mr. HULL. Yes; absolutely. Now, I want to say further that this idea that we do not need any more troops to go to Cuba may be true—I hope it is true—but we are providing for a state of affairs that may not meet our wishes, and it may be necessary to have them. I will say further to the House, on this question of selecting men or permitting them to volunteer who are exempt from diseases of tropical climates, that the President desires to have men that can occupy the seaports where yellow fever is prevalent, who have had the disease or have no fears of it, in order to avoid the sacrifice of life of volunteers of the States where they have had no experience with the diseases and no experience of the conditions that confront them, and whose climatic surroundings have been such that they are peculiarly liable to have the diseases of a tropical climate.

Mr. COX. Who does the gentleman think would be the best qualified to select the officers of the regiment of such men, the governors in a State where the yellow fever is prevalent, or the President of the United States?

Mr. HULL. I have gone over that once, and I will go over it again. The men are selected from the nation at large——

Mr. BAILEY. I was about to ask the gentleman from Iowa as to the construction of the second section of the bill. It authorizes their organization under the Volunteer Army bill, and it does not seem to me that they are organized except by each State contributing its quota. Now, the engineer corps is organized from "the nation at large," and I take occasion to say that I prefer to strike out the word "nation," as it has no legal definition, and substitute the words "United States," which have a well-known legal meaning. But it is different with——

Mr. HULL. The 10,000 men are not apportioned to any State.

Mr. BAILEY. No; but the President is only authorized to organize them under the provisions of the Volunteer Army bill, and under the provisions of that bill he was compelled to obtain a given number in a given way. Now, if he undertakes to add another 10,000 under the provisions of that bill, he is subject to all its limitations.

Mr. HULL. He is not subject, I think, to the limitation of trying to get them by apportionment among the States.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me ask the gentleman from Iowa whether in any part of this bill relating to the 10,000 men there is a word that authorizes the President to proceed in any way except under the Volunteer Army bill?

Mr. HULL. I think, so far as their organization is concerned, they are to be organized by the President from whatever locality may furnish volunteers possessing the qualifications required by the second section.

Mr. BAILEY. Suppose the State of Louisiana, having a larger population eligible under this bill than any other State, should raise and tender to the President the whole 10,000. The President is not authorized to accept from Louisiana more than her quota unless other States fail to provide their quota.

Mr. HULL. I can only give my friend the construction which the War Department puts on the provision, which is that there is no limitation as to where the men may come from if they possess the necessary qualifications.

Mr. BAILEY. Then let me ask, Is there not a limitation in the Volunteer Army bill?

Mr. HULL. That bill provides that the volunteers called for must be apportioned among the States and Territories; and there can be accepted from each State and Territory only its quota under the call.

Mr. BAILEY. Unless some States should fail to respond, in which case the deficiency may be accepted from other States.

Mr. HULL. In that case there is a reapportionment.

Mr. BAILEY. The President organizes these 10,000 men under the provisions of that bill.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have given the construction of the War Department.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman will examine the bill, which has been drawn, I presume, at the War Department——

Mr. MARSH. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to say that this bill is not an amendment to the volunteer bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I was not so treating it.

Mr. MARSH. It purports on its face to be something additional, but not a part of the volunteer bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I was not treating it as an amendment, but it is supplemental.

Mr. MARSH. It has nothing whatever to do with the volunteer bill. It is separate and distinct from it according to its very terms.

Mr. HULL. I want to say, so far as the Senate bill is concerned, that a large majority of the committee preferred the bill as we reported it to the House, which simply gave the President power to enlist 16,000 men possessing special qualifications. But the Senate has passed this bill; and, as I said in the beginning of this debate, both the President and the Secretary of War believe that if we are to utilize these men at all we should have them at once, so that, if possible, they can go with the first troops sent to Cuba. The President and the Secretary of War have requested that this bill be passed immediately, so as to avoid loss of time.

Mr. BAILEY. My judgment is that we could pass the bill in three minutes if the whole of the second section were made to conform to the Volunteer Army bill. But you adopt the Volunteer Army bill as authority in the organization of these 10,000 men, and then you change the method of appointing the officers.

Mr. HULL. So far as I am concerned, when the time comes for amendment I shall oppose any amendment of that character. I will say, however, that the regiments organized and ready to go into the service in twenty-four hours are perfectly satisfied with the arrangements of the Senate bill. Let me give one illustration: Colonel Hood, son of General Hood, formerly of Texas, has a regiment ready. He says they are immune. I am not going to stop to quarrel about words. I am speaking from what people who claim to know tell me. This regiment is ready to be accepted, and will be accepted within twenty-four hours after this bill is passed.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it already organized?

Mr. HULL. It is already organized.

Mr. BAILEY. Without authority?

Mr. HULL. Without authority. Colonel Hood tells me that these men are now awaiting at their own expense the passage of this bill, which they believe Congress will pass.

Mr. BAILEY. Have all the officers been elected?

Mr. HULL. Yes; every one of them. And so far as the appointment of these officers is concerned, I will say there is no greater risk in trusting the President to meet the wishes of the men who are going out to fight than there would be in trusting the appointment to the governors. These officers are elected without regard to apportionment among the States; and the Chief Executive of the nation is the proper man to appoint the officers.

Mr. STEELE. Has the President sent any official message to the House on this subject?

Mr. HULL. He has not.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. HULL] whether he does not think that his last suggestion would apply with equal force to the Volunteer Army as well as to these troops?

Mr. HULL. No; because those were apportioned to the States directly.

Mr. BAILEY. But I still insist there is no provision for raising these 10,000 men except under the provisions of that act. Does the gentleman from Iowa adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] that this bill has nothing whatever to do with the Volunteer Army bill?

Mr. HULL. I think this is supplemental to that.

Mr. BAILEY. It must be so both in effect and intention. You have organized 125,000 men; you have found that number insufficient, and you want 10,000 more. You propose to organize them under the provisions of the act providing for the 125,000; but instead of adopting that act as a whole, you make a departure as to the method of appointing the officers. If the second section of this bill had provided for the enlistment of the men and the appointment of the officers exactly as the first bill did, there would not have been any contention about the matter.

Mr. HULL. We adopt in this section a provision which has been carefully guarded, as we believe, and the appointment of the officers and the enlistment of volunteers under the bill passed a few days ago is simply an amendment to the statutes providing the means to fight the battles in which we are likely to be engaged.

A MEMBER. And this is a similar provision?

Mr. HULL. This is a similar provision.

Mr. BAILEY. But the gentleman ought to be able to assure Congress that at the close of the war both the men and the officers so provided will be mustered out.

Mr. HULL. There is no question about that.

Mr. BAILEY. Under what authority?

Mr. HULL. Under the authority of the law, which is——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time fixed for the general debate has expired. The Clerk will report the first section of the bill for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule.

The first section was read, as follows:

That, in addition to the volunteer forces provided for by the act of April 22, 1898, entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," the President may authorize the Secretary of War to organize, under the terms and conditions of the aforesaid act, a volunteer brigade of engineers from the nation at large, to consist of not more than three regiments and not more than 3,500 men, possessing the special qualifications necessary for engineer troops, under such rules and regulations, including the appointment of the officers thereof, as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That not to exceed three officers of the Corps of Engineers of the Regular Army may hold volunteer commissions in any one regiment of the volunteer brigade of engineers at the same time: And provided further, That all officers shall be appointed by the President and with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, I move as a substitute for the pending bill that which I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

Mr. HULL. The sections of the bill should be first perfected before a substitute is offered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute will be read and be considered as pending.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course amendments to the text will be first in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly. But the substitute will be in order after the bill is perfected; and it will be read now and considered as pending for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 6 of an act entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," approved April 22, 1898, be amended by striking out the word "three," where it occurs in the last proviso in said section, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixteen;" so that said proviso will read as follows: "Provided further, That the President may authorize the Secretary of War to organize companies, troops, battalions, or regiments possessing special qualifications from the nation at large, not to exceed 16,000 men, under such rules and regulations, including the appointment of the officers thereof, as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. MARSH. In my humble opinion, Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill is not a good bill. It has provisions in it that open up a new departure in the organization of the volunteer troops of this country. That which I have offered and which has just been read by the Clerk is proposed as a substitute to the pending bill, and has, after very full and careful consideration, met the approval of the Committee on Military Affairs as a substitute to what is known as the "Wheeler immune" bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois offer this as a substitute for the whole bill, or only for the first section?

Mr. MARSH. The entire bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not be in order, then, at this time.

Mr. MARSH. Then I will leave it there, as a part of my remarks, and offer it as a substitute when the proper time arrives.

My substitute provides an amendment to the existing volunteer bill—I mean the law which was passed the other day. It will be remembered that the House adopted a proviso there authorizing the President to organize not exceeding 3,000 troops into companies and battalions, or regiments, possessing "special qualifications," different from those of troops enlisted ordinarily, but not to exceed in number 3,000 all told. This substitute of mine simply changes the words "three thousand," so that it will read "sixteen thousand."

This enables the President, if it is adopted, to authorize the Secretary of War to organize companies, troops, battalions, or regiments with "special qualifications," not exceeding the number, however, of 16,000 men.

Now, the 3,000 voted for under the provisions of the bill already passed—the volunteer law—these men were volunteers who came mainly from the mountain States of the West to fill up the required number without delay. This provision for 16,000 more, that may be enlisted under the amendment, provides that they may be enlisted in Louisiana, in Texas, or in any of the Gulf States, or anywhere else, wherever the President chooses to enlist them.

He is not confined, however, to "immunes," and they are not excluded, but he may exercise his best judgment in the organization of the additional 13,000 men, making 16,000 in all. But as required under the law—and that is the only qualification—they shall possess some special adaptability or qualification for the service. For instance, some may be specially qualified for the engineer corps, some may be specially qualified for the pontoon corps, some of them may be qualified for electrical engineer corps, or the torpedo corps, as the case may be, or some of them may be specially qualified and adapted to meet the climatic influences where a state of war certainly will exist. It leaves the entire matter to the judgment of the President to select the men with special qualifications who in his judgment may be satisfactory and adapted to the conditions prevailing.

It makes the amendment also, if it be adopted, a part of the volunteer law now in force, subject to all of the qualifications that that law possesses; and every man on the floor knows when these have been adopted and added to the late law exactly what the rights of the Government are and what the rights enlisted men are; and not only now, when the enlistments are being made, but at the close of the war. There can be no question in anybody's mind as to whether these men shall be retained in the service or removed after the close of the war, because the provision is clear that they shall be mustered out when their services are no longer needed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I may be allowed two or three minutes longer in explanation of the amendment.

Mr. COX. Let me say to the gentleman that he knows very well that I agree with him as to his amendment of the volunteer bill.

Mr. MARSH. That is all the change it makes in the system.

Mr. COX. I should like to have the gentleman insert "including the appointment of officers thereof as provided in the volunteer act."

Mr. MARSH. Now, I will say to my friend from Tennessee that he and I and every citizen of this country ought, in my opinion, to be willing to trust the President of the United States to commission 16,000 volunteers, when we have conferred upon the governors the right to commission the officers of 125,000 volunteers or 500,000, if the President calls for them.

Mr. COX. But I believe in the doctrine——

Mr. MARSH. I want to say that the President of the United States will take into consideration the wishes of the enlisted men in as high a degree as will the governor of Tennessee or the governor of any other State in the Union.

Mr. COX. You were the most earnest man in that committee, when we had the volunteer bill under consideration, for the provision that the governors should appoint the officers upon the recommendation of the men.

Mr. MARSH. I was.

Mr. COX. Now, I want to know why these 10,000 are different from those men, and why they have not the same privilege that the others have?

Mr. MARSH. I will say to my friend from Tennessee that this is a special corps, to be enlisted from all over this country. No one regiment will probably come from any one State, and it is therefore impracticable for the governors of the States to commission the officers of even one regiment.

Mr. COX. We have already got a regiment for you.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "nation," in line 10 of the first section, and substitute the words "United States."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 10, the word "nation," and insert "United States."

So that it will read—

From the United States at large.

Mr. HULL. I hope that that will not be adopted. That simply makes an amendment to go back to the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I had supposed that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] would readily consent to an amendment that is so clearly proper. I am not disposed to be hypercritical or overcareful about a matter of this kind, but the words "United States" have a perfectly clear legal meaning. The word "nation" has absolutely no legal meaning. I recall that in our hurry to pass the resolutions of intervention, we all agreed, without a protest, to language that hereafter we shall all regret was not corrected. We passed resolutions that "the Government of the United States" does this and that. Now, "the Government of the United States" has no legal meaning in the law. The words "the United States" have a meaning. Our statutes provide that the enacting clause of every bill shall be:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

But neither the word "nation" nor the word "government," as distinguished from "the United States," has any meaning in the law or ought to have any place in a bill of this kind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe I will see how many are in favor of having it right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 54.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair votes in the negative.

Mr. BLAND. Let us have tellers. I think it is important that this bill should be right. I do not see why a bill of this character can not be amended so as to be right.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker pro tempore appointed Mr. HULL and Mr. BAILEY.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 77.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by inserting, in line 7, on page 1, after the word "authorized," the words "during the present war."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert on page 1, in line 7, after the word "authorized," the words "during the present war;" so that it will read "be authorized during the present war," etc.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, this bill is not a bill to authorize the President to call out additional troops, additional regiments, or even a single additional soldier. Under the legislation which we have already had the President can call out all men of military age in the United States. He can call out those who are immune just as well as he can call out others. All that he would have to do to get a regiment, or ten regiments, of immune soldiers would be to issue another call addressed to the governors of the States where the immunes are living and asking them to organize regiments of immunes.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is simply a bill to enable the President of the United States to appoint some 800 officers in the Volunteer Army instead of having those officers appointed by the governors of the respective States. That is all there is in the bill.

The Committee on Military Affairs has persistently pursued that policy. The first thing they brought in here, in the bill for the reorganization of the Army, was a proposition which under its provisions would have fought the entire war with the Regular Army without giving a chance for any Volunteer Army at all.

The House discussed that question, argued about that bill, picked it to pieces, and recommitted it to the Committee on Military Affairs. Then they came in with a bill which we could support, after amendment, a bill which increased the Regular Army in time of war to 61,000.

They also brought us in a bill providing for a volunteer army. When they brought in that bill, they did not provide that the governors of the States should appoint the officers, but simply that the governors should recommend the officers and the President appoint them; but the House preferred that the governors of the States should appoint the officers.

Mr. HULL. That is not true at all; not a word of it.

Mr. BELKNAP. That is not a fact.

Mr. HANDY. Then my memory is at fault.

Mr. BELKNAP. The gentleman is very much mistaken.

Mr. HANDY. Will you state the facts?

Mr. BELKNAP. The committee unanimously reported a bill providing that the officers selected by the governors should be accepted.

Mr. MARSH. The bill as reported by the committee provided that the officers should be appointed by the governors.

Mr. HANDY. My memory of the facts comes back to me. The statements of gentlemen clear up the mistake into which I have fallen. The bill as it was offered by the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, was along the line I have described, but the committee corrected him in that and proposed amendments which gave the power of appointment to the governors.

Mr. HULL. The committee did not do that. The bill I introduced was a bill sent me; and on my own motion, if the gentleman must have what we did in the committee, and by the consent of every member of the committee, we made the change, so that the governors appoint the officers of the volunteer force.

Mr. HANDY. I am not attacking the committee, but I am stating that they have come in here to-day with a bill along this same old line. This bill provides for 13,500 volunteer soldiers and fixes it so that the officers will be appointed by the President of the United States instead of by the governors of the States. I have no objection to calling out 13,500 more volunteer soldiers. The President has the power now to call out an unlimited number of volunteer soldiers; but the law requires that when soldiers are thus called out they shall come from the respective States, and that the officers, from the colonel down, shall be appointed by the governors of the States.

This bill comes in and requires the President himself to appoint the officers for these 13,500 men. In that respect alone, so far as I can see, this proposed legislation makes a material change in the provisions of law for raising a volunteer army.

This is not only a bill for this particular war, but it will remain on the statute books. When another war comes, the President would at once, under the law as it would stand under this bill and other bills recently passed, have authority to increase the Regular Army to 61,000, and to raise 16,500 volunteer soldiers, making in all 77,500 men, every one of whom would be officered by men appointed by the President, and there might be no possible room for the volunteer officers to be appointed by governors of the various States.

That is the fact as I understand and construe this bill. I am, of course, endeavoring to state the facts as they are. I think this amendment ought to be passed so that the 13,500 special soldiers herein provided may relate to the Spanish war alone.

Perhaps the whole bill ought to be defeated, for it does not add anything to the power the President now has to raise troops. He has now full authority to raise all the troops he sees fit and proper. It gives the President authority to appoint the officers of these 13,500 troops, which he would not have under the law we recently passed; it increases the officers of the Army to be appointed by the President by from 700 to 800; simply this and nothing more.

If there is anything else in this bill, I can not see it. If the President wants more volunteers, he can call for them; if he wants immunes, he can call for them. He can get them without the passage of this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the time fixed for taking a vote on the bill will expire in five minutes. Am I right?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The Chair is informed that fifteen minutes only have been occupied under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HANDY. We have suspended several times for various interruptions, and that ought to be taken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Only fifteen minutes under the five-minute rule have been used.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I hope the debate will not be closed yet.

Mr. HULL. I want to say that I do not believe the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] amounts to anything, because it simply declares what the bill already provides. It will simply have the effect of sending back and delaying the passage of a measure which is most earnestly desired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Delaware will examine the volunteer bill passed on the 22d of April, he will discover that there is no occasion for the amendment which he seeks to put in. Section 5 of that act is now a law, and under which, unfortunately in my judgment, this act, if it becomes an act, will proceed, and expressly provides that the term of enlistment of all volunteers called out when war opens shall cease at the close of the war. Then this bill provides——

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me an interruption?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. HANDY. My point is not that these men enlisted will have a permanent enlistment, but that the law will remain permanently upon the statute books. When these men are disbanded and another war grows up, this law remains, so that the President of the United States, when war is declared, will be authorized to extend the Regular Army to 61,000 men, and he can not only call out the volunteer force, but he can, under this act, raise 16,500 men and officer them in the Volunteer Army and thereby prevent that many troops from being raised and officered by the States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That possibly might be the case; but if it was, when Congress attempted to pass an act authorizing the calling out of troops in the beginning of the next war, all they have to do is to repeal this one; so it is a matter really of no importance. But, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to something that I think is worthy of consideration. This act provides for the organization by the War Department of ten additional regiments of enlisted men, and the aim of the bill, the purpose of the bill, is that the President may get these troops wherever they can be had, troops that come within the particular description of the bill.

In that direction I wholly support the bill and think it ought to pass; but what I want to suggest to the gentleman is this: The act passed on the 22d of April provides that when it becomes necessary to raise the Volunteer Army the President shall issue his proclamation, and thereupon the number of men called for by the proclamation shall be distributed to the States proportioned to their population. Section 2 of this act provides that the President is further empowered under the act of April 22, 1898, to call for 10,000 more troops.

Now, I submit to the gentleman from Iowa that it is better to go back to the Senate for an amendment than it is to pass a defective law. I call his attention and ask the distinguished gentleman who represents the Military Committee whether there is any way, if this should become a law, that under the provisions of the act of April 22, 1898, these troops should not be distributed to the States in proportion to their population?

Mr. HULL. I want to say that the very object of this act is to avoid the distribution to the States according to population, and I think it does so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not do it. I do not believe the gentleman from Iowa will state to the House that in his judgment it does.

Mr. HULL. I will state to the House that in the judgment of the War Department it does.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me give you an illustration in regard to that. They sent two measures here the other day, or from time to time, and we passed them. Whoever may be to blame, it remains that when these 125,000 volunteers get into the field under the organization provided for by the laws we passed they will be as dissimilar almost as their numerical number——

Mr. HULL. I want to say to the gentleman that the War Department was very much averse to the proviso that was put in. It was the fault of the Military Committee and the House of Representatives.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me tell gentlemen what we did. We have a provision in the State of Ohio that we will give a sergeant-major to every battalion. In very many other States they will have one to a regiment. In Ohio we have three majors; in other States only two. In some States we have an assistant surgeon with the rank of captain, and in many of the other States the old-time provision of the war of 1861, wherein the assistant surgeon only ranks as lieutenant.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not pointed out yet, Mr. Speaker, the real trouble, and I move to strike out the last word. I will only take a moment.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen here are anxious to get to the second section of the bill. Will not the gentleman from Ohio consent that a vote may be taken on my amendment and then go to section 2?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will do anything to accommodate.

The amendment of Mr. HANDY was rejected.

Mr. HARTMAN. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in as section 2.

Mr. MARSH. The gentleman offers a substitute for section 2, which has not yet been read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment, and then the Chair will be able to decide upon it.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the President is further empowered, under the act of April 22, 1898, to authorize the Secretary of War to organize an additional volunteer force of not exceeding 2,000 enlisted men, the officers thereof to be appointed by the President upon the nomination of the men composing the regiments so organized.

Mr. HARTMAN. I want to occupy a minute or two——

Mr. HAY. I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane to section 1.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the point of order good.

Mr. HARTMAN. I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order for a moment.

Mr. BALL. I will renew it if he does.

Mr. HAY. I am unwilling to reserve the point, because we desire to reach section 2, which is the important section of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read the next section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. And the President is further empowered under the act of April 22, 1898, to authorize the Secretary of War to organize an additional volunteer force of not exceeding 10,000 enlisted men possessing immunity from diseases incident to tropical climates; the officers thereof to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. BALL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 12, page 2, all after the word "climates" and insert the following:

"The officers thereof from the rank of colonel and below such rank to be selected and elected by said volunteer forces. The officers so elected and selected shall be designated and commissioned by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Said officers, when hostilities cease, to be subject to provisions of volunteer act passed April 22, A. D. 1898."

Mr. HAY. I offer as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, page 2, after the word "appointed," insert:
"As volunteer officers are now appointed under the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes,' approved April 22, 1898."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that this is an amendment to the section, and not an amendment to the amendment. It does not relate to the subject of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman can offer it hereafter.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Speaker, the amendment I have sent to the desk ought, it seems to me, to meet with the universal approbation of the House. There is no indisposition on my part to withhold the right of appointment of these officers either from the President of the United States or from the governors of the States; but there are peculiar circumstances surrounding the enlistments proposed by this bill; and in view of the fact that these immunes, so called, are to be furnished by the South in addition to the regular volunteers already furnished, I submit that the volunteer troops should at least have the privilege of selecting the officers under whom they will go to battle. There can be no question that if this bill becomes a law serious service will be expected of the men who volunteer under this act.

I recognize the fact, Mr. Speaker, that it is impracticable in a measure like this to authorize the governors of the States to commission these officers, because they must be taken from certain latitudes and certain States. They will probably be made up of troops from a number of States. But I see no reason why they should not be intrusted with the selection of their own officers. The further provision is added that after the war is over the officers thus elected shall be subject to the volunteer act passed April 22, 1898, and shall be mustered out. This, it seems to me, meets objections which may be made from any quarter. I think the amendment ought to be passed practically by unanimous vote.

Mr. MORRIS. Does the gentleman anticipate that under his amendment the troops organized under the second section of this act shall not only elect their lieutenants and captains, but also their regimental and field officers?

Mr. BALL. The amendment proposes only that they shall elect officers of the rank of colonel and below. The President will still appoint the other officers.

Mr. HULL. We did not go so far as this in the volunteer bill. We simply said that the governors might appoint.

Mr. BALL. Under my amendment the troops themselves do that which the governors are authorized to do in the volunteer bill. The President will designate the officers that may be elected by the men.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there any provision in the bill for holding a caucus and election for the choice of officers when a battle is imminent or in progress? Suppose a captain should be killed in action. Are military movements to be stopped long enough to allow a caucus to be held for the election of another captain?

Mr. BALL. No; I do not think there is any such provision in the pending bill to which I offer this substitute as an amendment. I think the gentleman's objection is trivial and ridiculous. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. BALL was rejected, there being—ayes 44, noes 62.

Mr. HAY. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "appointed," in line 12, page 2, insert:
"As volunteer officers are now appointed under the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes,' approved April 22, 1898."

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to occupy the time of the House to say anything further than what I said in the general debate. I understand the objection to this amendment is that gentlemen say it is not practicable. I think it is as practicable as it is to appoint any other volunteer officers in the Volunteer Army. Why should not the governors of these States from which these troops are called appoint these officers? It may be said that there may be one man from the District of Columbia, or from some other internal portion of this country, who will go down to Louisiana and enlist in a regiment there. But if he goes down there and enlists there, and the organization is formed in that State, why then it is under the jurisdiction of the governor of that State and under the jurisdiction of the general law which we passed for volunteer soldiers.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] said a few moments ago, when he was arguing in favor of this bill, that he did not want to give the right to any other people to hold the integrity of this country in the Island of Cuba, but that he was willing to vote and is willing to say that 10,000 men, who may be immunes and who may not be immunes, shall undertake to defend the integrity of this country in the Island of Cuba. It does seem to me that expressions of that sort are very peculiar, and I think, sir, that when gentlemen get up here and warn people against the yellow fever, and talk about it as if it was a great scare, it is very unwise. I think that the people of this country, when they go to war, are ready to meet disease or bullets or anything else, and I do not believe that the danger is as great as has been said.

I have undertaken, as well as I could, to find out whether or not there is this great danger from yellow fever in the Island of Cuba. I am told that if proper precautions are used there is not, and I say that our troops in the field and the men who have to fight this war ought not to be panic-stricken by gentlemen getting up on this floor and saying that they are certainly going to die if they go to Cuba. Ten thousand immunes will not be enough to save them. You have not got enough immunes to save them from the yellow fever, if yellow fever is so bad as is said. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think that this amendment which I have offered is a practical one. It is along the lines of the Volunteer Army bill, and it ought to be adopted by the House.

The amendment of Mr. HAY was rejected.

Mr. HARTMAN. I now ask that the amendment which I offered, which I sent up a short time ago, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the President is further empowered, under the act of April 22, 1898, to authorize the Secretary of War to organize an additional volunteer force of not exceeding 2,000 enlisted men, the officers thereof to be appointed by the President, upon the nomination of the men composing the regiments so organized.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to consume the time of the House for more than two minutes, in support of this amendment. I offer it for this reason: The provisions of the bill now pending do not provide for such an additional force as will admit some very clamorous but gallant citizens from my own State and surrounding ones, who are desirous of serving their country. They come, it is true, from what Mr. Cleveland saw fit to denominate the undesirable States; but they have already offered a larger percentage of their male population than any other State in the Union in defense of the Government. We have three magnificently equipped companies of cavalry that have not yet been able to be assigned to a position in the defense of this Government. All that have been offered outside of those three and some two or three volunteer companies have been accepted.

My purpose for offering this amendment is to make it possible that they and other similar troops in surrounding States may have the privilege of coming to the rescue of the Government at this particular time. I should have provided in this amendment that the governor should appoint the officers were it not for the fact that I presumed that a full regiment would not come from any single State. I have therefore provided, as you will observe, that the officers shall be appointed by the President upon the nomination of the men composing the regiments.

The amendment of Mr. HARTMAN was rejected.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I want to offer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of lines 11 and 12, of section 2, the words "immunity from diseases incident to tropical climates" and insert in lieu thereof the words "such special qualifications as are in his opinion desirable for the service."

Mr. STEELE. That strikes out the immune part and gives all States alike a fair chance to furnish these volunteers.

The amendment of Mr. STEELE was rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all in lines 12 and 13 of section 2, relating to the authority of the President to appoint the officers, so as to leave the officers and the organization of the 10,000 men entirely under the Volunteer Army law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 2 strike out, after the word "climates," the words "the officers thereof to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Ohio to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. My amendment covers the same subject-matter, but it is in the form of a third section to the bill, and I presume it is not in order here.

Mr. BAILEY. I will detain the House but a moment. The effort I make here is the effort I have made before to put these 10,000 men upon precisely the same footing as the rest of the Volunteer Army, and inasmuch as they are organized under the provisions of that bill, I believe they ought to be officered also under the provisions of that bill. If this motion should prevail, that would be the only effect of its adoption.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the great objection to the gentleman's amendment is that under this bill there will likely be troops from several States composing a regiment, and you will have the governors of the different States quarreling over the question who shall commission the officers. I am opposed to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. BAILEY was rejected.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in as section 3 of the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. The provisions of the act of April 22, 1898, which provide that volunteers called out by proclamation of the President shall be apportioned to the several States and the provisions of said act which provide that the governors of the States shall appoint officers shall not apply to this act.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Just one word. I think the point made by the gentleman from Texas originally has not been answered, and I believe it can not be answered. I believe that if this bill passes in the form in which it is now these troops will have to be apportioned to the several States and Territories in proportion to the population. I do not believe there is any competent lawyer on this floor who will take that bill and read the former act and then controvert my position. I myself am in grave doubt whether the provisions of the former act with relation to the appointment of officers would not also prevail. Now, this makes the matter perfectly plain. It relieves the bill of its uncertainty. Above all things these provisions that are to be put rapidly into motion ought to be so plain that they can be distinctly understood without having recourse to litigation.

Mr. HULL. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that if the lawyers on this floor have any doubt as to that point—though I have no doubt myself—I am perfectly willing to have the amendment go in, because that is the very object of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I only want to say——

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Iowa says if there is any doubt about the present effect of the bill, he has no objection to this amendment going in. Now, it seems to me that the Senate have passed a bill which they intend to mean just what we have now said or will say by this amendment. There is no fear about the Senate disagreeing in the amendment, as it does not change the intention of the bill, and I think it is a proper change.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Insert in line 7, on page 2, after the word "empowered," the words "during the present war." The chairman of the committee formerly objected to such an amendment on a former section.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 7, after the word "empowered," insert the words "during the present war."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order. We voted that amendment down.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, that point of order does not hold. The amendment was offered to a previous section of the bill.

Mr. HULL. It is another section?

Mr. HANDY. It is another section.

Mr. HULL. I simply thought it was a repetition of the same amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules that point of order.

Mr. HULL. I do not make it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Just one word. The gentleman has accepted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, which makes clear and specific what the gentleman said was the purpose of the bill, to make it operative during the present war. If so, what objection can there be to accepting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware?

Mr. HULL. I have no objection on earth, if any man thinks that it needs to be limited.

Mr. DOCKERY. Inasmuch as the bill has to go back to the Senate, I do not see why it may not be further amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, there seems to be common consent about improving the bill, and as it must go back to the Senate I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa the propriety of adopting the words "United States" in the first section of the bill.

Mr. HULL. I am rather proud of recognizing this country as a "nation;" and it seems to me that it can do no harm in these acts to refer to the United States as a nation. I think we are one.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the gentleman ought to strike out "United States in Congress assembled" and insert "nation in Congress assembled."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for debate under the five-minute rule has expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois desires to offer a substitute for the bill. It would not be in order at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That all officers herein provided for shall be mustered out and discharged at the close of the present war or cessation of hostilities between Spain and the United States.

Mr. KING. I just desire——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The Chair would suggest that section 3 has already been provided for by the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and the amendment of the gentleman from Utah could be made section 4.

Mr. KING. Make it section 4.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KING. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 75.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following as a substitute for the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 6 of an act entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," approved April 22, 1898, be amended by striking out the word "three," where it occurs in the last proviso in said section, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixteen," so that said proviso will read as follows: "Provided further, That the President may authorize the Secretary of War to organize companies, troops, battalions, or regiments possessing special qualifications from the nation at large, not to exceed 16,000 men, under such rules and regulations, including the appointment of the officers thereof, as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the words just read.

Mr. MARSH. I would like to have a few minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Time for debate has expired.

The question was taken; and the substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions that the officers to command these immunes or special troops shall be elected as provided for the volunteers in a bill calling out the military forces of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions that the officers to command these immunes or special troops shall be selected as provided for the volunteers in a bill calling out the military forces of the United States.

Mr. HULL. I move the previous question.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Speaker, I——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa demands the previous question.

Mr. COX. Have I not five minutes on that motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. The time for debate was limited, and the gentleman in charge of the bill demands the previous question.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman if he will not yield me time to explain my motion?

Mr. HULL. This question has been discussed so fully that I must insist on the demand.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. COX. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 40.

So the previous question was ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to recommit; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KING. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 68.

So the motion to recommit was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill; and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NAVAL BATTALION IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1316) to provide for organizing a naval battalion in the District of Columbia having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments.

S. G. HILBORN,
G. E. FOSS,
ADOLPH MEYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,
WILLIAM E. CHANDLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill S. 1816, an act to provide for organizing a naval battalion in the District of Columbia, submit the following statement:

The first amendment of the House provided that the battalion contemplated by the above-named bill should be a part of the militia already authorized for the District of Columbia, instead of in addition thereto, as in the original bill. The second amendment proposed to strike out the word "relative," so that it would give the staff officers absolute instead of relative rank. After full and free interchange of views, the House conferees agreed to recede from the House amendments, and as now recommended the bill stands as it was passed by the Senate.

S. G. HILBORN.
G. E. FOSS.
ADOLPH MEYER.

Mr. HILBORN. I move that the House adopt the report of the conferees.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, this well illustrates the danger of legislation affecting the Army or the Navy at this particular time. This bill has been pending for two years; perhaps longer than that. At least one year ago, when we were not in a war and nobody supposed we were on the edge of a war, it was sought to pass this very bill by unanimous consent, and I objected. I agreed then that they might pass it by unanimous consent if they would organize this naval battalion as a part of the militia of the District. I insisted upon that because I was unwilling to be adding to either the land or the naval forces of the United States in time of peace and for the purposes of peace.

I said very frankly to the gentleman in charge of it, as well as to those outside interested in its passage, that I would prefer for these men to constitute a part of the naval establishment of the United States rather than a part of the military establishment; and if they would agree to reduce the District militia by the same number as they increased the naval force, I would not only withdraw my objection to the bill, but I would assist in its passage.

The matter remained in that state until something like two or three weeks ago, when the gentleman from California [Mr. HILBORN] again asked unanimous consent for consideration of the bill. I again objected unless the amendment should be offered and agreed to. The gentleman from California agreed to offer the amendment; but another gentleman on this side, not understanding exactly the status of the matter, interposed an objection. It was then brought again to the attention of the House by unanimous consent. The amendment was offered, and the bill as amended was passed. It went back to the Senate, and a gentleman who is interested in its passage addressed a letter to the Senator having it in charge urging him to agree to the amendment of the House. The Senator declined to do it on the ground that the House ought never to have adopted the amendment.

Now, this enforces the danger of that progress of events which all of us feared in the beginning, that there would be men take advantage of the patriotic zeal and enthusiasm which now exist to create new military and naval offices and increase both the naval and military establishments of the United States. Only within the last ten days one of the great publications of this country has congratulated the people that the inevitable result of this war will be to bring this Government out of it stronger both in its naval and military establishment. They assert it as a matter of congratulation that the war now existing between this country and Spain is calculated to produce a change of sentiment on the part of the people of the United States in respect to a large military and naval establishment.

I think we made it plain in the beginning, I think we have kept it plain up to this time, and I am sure we will keep it equally as plain to the end, that whatever men and whatever money may be needed to prosecute this war to an early and successful termination we stand as ready to vote as any gentlemen on this floor. But for my part I never will agree to see a single man added to the permanent military establishment of the United States to be used against our own people after the need of using them against an alien nation is passed. [Applause.] I believe that the House ought to insist on its amendment, made under circumstances of the peculiar character which I have related.

The young gentlemen can be organized as a part of the District militia. Their organization can continue, but if they persist in seeking an organization as a permanent addition to the Army or the Navy of the United States, then, when these unhappy days shall have passed, the people who still believe that a great army is a menace to the liberties of a free people, the people who know, taught by experience, that when any country keeps an immense army to use against its foreign foes the temptation is to use it upon improper occasions in the interference of domestic affairs—when men who cherish these views obtain control, as they will, the advocates of this measure will find that in overreaching us they have overreached themselves, because the bill is as certain to be repealed if it passes in this form as that it passes to-day.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, this bill as it passed the Senate provided for the creation of a battalion of four companies of naval militia for the District of Columbia. It provided that these four companies should be in addition to the regular militia of the District of Columbia. It came over here; it was amended by striking out that, and providing that it should be a part of the naval militia of the District, and in that form it passed the House. It went back to the Senate, and there for the first time we discovered that the militia of the District of Columbia was full, and hence the bill with this amendment would render this act nugatory and valueless. They of course refused to accept the amendment, and in conference they insisted upon their position.

Now, as to this proposition that we are dangerously increasing the military arm of the Government at this time, I have only to say that the Senate bill as it passed was exactly like the legislation that has taken place in almost all the States of the Union. The Naval Militia as now existing has been provided for, I think, in seventeen or eighteen of the different States of the Union, and in almost every State the law provides that this naval militia shall be in addition to the regular militia of the several States. In time of peace the State of Louisiana passed a law creating a naval militia and provided that it should be in addition to the regular militia of the State. The State of Virginia did the same; the State of North Carolina did the same; the State of South Carolina did the same; the States of Vermont, California, New York, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts all have upon their statute books laws providing for the creation of a naval militia for their States and providing that it shall be in addition to the regular militia provided for by law. I do not think there is any danger lurking in this proposition to increase in this way the militia of the several States.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on agreeing to the conference report, there were on a division (called for by Mr. BAILEY)—ayes 71, noes 45.

Mr. BAILEY. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore proceeded to count the House.

Mr. MOODY and others (before the count was completed) called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore proceeded to take the question on ordering the yeas and nays, and having counted those rising in the affirmative, said: In the opinion of the Chair, a sufficient number has risen; and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I submit as a question of order that while the point of no quorum is pending it is not in order for any gentleman to demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the way to ascertain whether there is a quorum or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The result would be the same, if no quorum had been found present; that is, the yeas and nays would have been ordered under the rule.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true. When it has been ascertained that no quorum is present, then the rule orders a roll call. But I think in the interest of orderly procedure, it is better to follow the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Constitution provides that at the request of one-fifth of the members present, the yeas and nays shall at any time be entered on the Journal.

Mr. BAILEY. On that point I desire simply to observe that that constitutional provision is only operative when the House is in a condition to do business. When the absence of a quorum is disclosed, a condition of parliamentary paralysis ensues; and the House is unable to do anything except to bring to its Hall a majority of its members or to adjourn from day to day. And everybody will admit that the ordering of the yeas and nays is its business; and the House can not transact any business without a quorum. The Chair will find that this question has been decided and ruled against my present contention; but I think it was decided wrong. I made the point, insisting then as I now insist, although at that time a gentleman of different political faith occupied the chair.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does not the gentleman overlook the fact that the absence of a quorum has not yet been disclosed? We have not yet reached that point.

Mr. BAILEY. It is disclosed so far as we have gone by the vote on a division, and that is exactly where I made the point. Now, there is a way of ascertaining the presence or the absence of a quorum. Under our present rules the Chair proceeds to do it by an actual count of the House, or it can be done by a call of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. But suppose the rule just referred to by the gentleman did not exist (as it did not until a few years ago), then does the gentleman contend that it is not in the power of the House to order the yeas and nays when a quorum has not been disclosed.

Mr. BAILEY. I undoubtedly do when the absence of a quorum has been disclosed.

Mr. DINGLEY. The rule referred to is simply a new provision for ascertaining the presence or absence of a quorum.

Mr. BAILEY. The only power remaining in the House, the moment it discovers itself without a quorum, is either to compel the attendance of absent members or to adjourn from day to day. Until it has sufficiently compelled the attendance of absent members to disclose a quorum, it is utterly unable to do any business.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the absence of a quorum is not yet disclosed under any actual proceeding.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the very question now pending; and at present the presumption is that no quorum is present, a presumption which arose the moment that a quorum failed to vote, and that point was made. The moment the presumption of the absence of a quorum arises the House is powerless to transact any business until that presumption is overcome.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order.

Mr. BLAND. The Constitution provides that "on any question" the yeas and nays may be ordered on demand of one-fifth of those present. The right to order the yeas and nays is about the only right we have left, and therefore I am a stickler for that right.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Missouri (if he will excuse me for saying it) confuses this question. The yeas and nays must be entered on the Journal upon the demand of one-fifth; but before one-fifth can demand that the yeas and nays be entered on the Journal the House must be in a position to proceed with the consideration of that question. In other words, suppose——

Mr. BLAND. Not one-fifth of a quorum, but one-fifth of those present.

Mr. BAILEY. One-fifth of those present. Now, one-fifth of those present in the absence of a quorum could force the yeas and nays on the question of a call of the House or on the question of an adjournment from day to day. One-fifth of them could compel a roll call upon a motion to arrest absentees and bring them to the bar of the House. One-fifth of them could compel a roll call upon any question that the House was competent to consider. But the point I make now is that whenever the House finds itself without a quorum it is incompetent to consider any question except a question which relates to the presence of its members or an adjournment from day to day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule upon the question. When the suggestion is made that no quorum is present, the rule provides that the Chair shall count the House to ascertain whether a quorum is present or not; but, in addition to that, the Constitution provides that at any time one-fifth of those present may order the yeas and nays upon any subject. Now, the House has not yet ascertained that no quorum is present in this case. No quorum voted on the last vote, but it does not appear that no quorum is present. The House, under the constitutional right, may override the rule of simply counting to ascertain if a quorum is present, and order the yeas and nays. On that vote it will appear whether a quorum votes upon that question. If it does not, of course then the point of order is still good that no quorum is present. Now, this matter has been ruled upon before.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me ask the Chair this: Suppose that on the count, this being on the demand for the yeas and nays, it should transpire that the gentlemen supporting the demand should rise and be counted and the gentlemen opposing the demand should rise and be counted, it being necessary that one-fifth of those present shall support the demand. Now, suppose that those who support the demand and those opposing it should be less than a quorum. Would the Chair hold that a number less than a quorum could order the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the Chair holds that ordering the yeas and nays is not the transaction of business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Well, that was what Speaker Carlisle held in the Forty-ninth Congress, and the Chair is inclined to believe that that is correct.

Mr. BAILEY. And if the Chair will examine, Speaker Carlisle held that upon the supposition that Speaker Randall before him had held it, and yet it was not held exactly by Speaker Randall, and, more than that, there was absolutely no argument of the question. I conceive it to be true—and I think the Chair will not deny it—that the ordering of the yeas and nays is the transaction of business within the meaning of the rule that forbids a motion to adjourn being repeated except after the transaction of intervening business. The RECORD and the Journal are full of instances where, a motion to adjourn having been defeated and the yeas and nays upon a pending question having been ordered, it has been held that business had been transacted within the meaning of the rule, and the motion to adjourn might be repeated. And I venture to say that, except in reference to this particular matter, no decisions can be found in the annals of this or any other parliamentary body that ordering the yeas and nays is not the transaction of business. And if the House can transact that kind of business when it is disabled for the lack of a quorum, I submit that it can transact any other kind of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask the Clerk to read a decision made by the Speaker in the Fifty-first Congress in this connection.

Mr. BAILEY. You will find one in the Fifty-third Congress, too, which also decides against my contention.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On July 29, 1890:

Mr. CANNON moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 10884) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes.

And the question being put,

There appeared on division—yeas 57, nays 40.

Mr. BYNUM made the point of order that no quorum was present.

The Speaker thereupon proceeded to count the House.

When,

Mr. KERR demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. RICHARDSON made the point of order that the said demand was not in order, for the reason that the last vote disclosed the fact that a quorum was not present.

The Speaker overruled the said point of order on the ground that a quorum was not required to order the yeas and nays, and also on the ground that the demand for the yeas and nays was a constitutional right, and that the ordering of the yeas and nays, as stated in the ruling of Speaker Carlisle in the last Congress, was "a proceeding relating merely to the method by which the sense of the House is ascertained on a matter of business." The yeas and nays is the final vote of the House on a pending question.

And the question being put on the said motion of Mr. CANNON,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. The yeas and nays are ordered on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BAILEY. The yeas and nays have not been ordered. They have only been demanded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Oh, yes. The Chair decided that there was evidently a sufficient number for ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAILEY. That had escaped my attention.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As many as are in favor of the adoption of the conference report will say "aye;" those opposed, "no." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 108, nays 51, answered "present" 11, not voting 190; as follows:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of the legislature of Massachusetts relative to the extermination of the gypsy moth; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

[Commonwealth of Massachusetts. In the year 1898.]

MEMORIAL RELATIVE TO THE EXTERMINATION OF THE GYPSY MOTH.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The general court of Massachusetts, now in session, desires to memorialize your honorable bodies that you will grant an appropriation to assist in the work of exterminating the gypsy moth in this Commonwealth.

In the last session of Congress an appropriation was made providing for "an investigation into the ravages of the gypsy moth." This investigation has been made by Prof. L. O. Howard, entomologist, of Washington, D. C., in a very thorough manner. The report has been issued by the Department of Agriculture, and contains many words of praise for the work which Massachusetts has accomplished. He says:

"It is true that a large amount of money has been expended, and it is also true that much more money must be expended before extermination can be accomplished; but it is undoubtedly safe to say that the money which has been and will be spent by the State in this work is but as a drop in the bucket to the loss which would have been occasioned by the insect had it been allowed to spread unchecked. The loss would have fallen not only upon the State of Massachusetts, but upon other States of the Union, so that we may say that the State work has not only been wisely done, but that it has been patriotically done.

"The simple fact that it has unquestionably been exterminated over considerable stretches of territory, and that extensive colonies existing in the most disadvantageous territory for the prosecution of remedial work have been so thoroughly destroyed that not an individual moth has been found for three years with the most rigid annual inspection, is sufficient proof of this possibility, for what can be done for one section can be done for all, if the means be sufficient. * * * A continuation of the appropriations for a few more years is unquestionably a necessity."

Were the appropriation to lapse a single year, the work which has been done during the past six years would be largely lost. The $75,000 already appropriated would have been spent in vain.

At a meeting of the Association of Economic Entomologists held in Detroit, August 12 and 13, 1897, the following preamble and resolve were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the Association of Economic Entomologists is familiar with the efforts being made by the State of Massachusetts to exterminate the gypsy moth; and

"Whereas on two former occasions it has indorsed this undertaking by public resolutions; and

"Whereas the existence of the gypsy moth in Massachusetts is a standing menace not only to the agricultural and forestry interests of that State, but to those of the country at large: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That this association would urge upon the people of Massachusetts the danger of dilatory measures and the wisdom and great importance of providing liberally for the work of exterminating the gypsy moth."

At the National Farmers' Congress held at St. Paul August 31 to September 1, 1897, the matter, as in former years, was considered, and the following resolve adopted:

"Resolved, That the efforts of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in endeavoring to exterminate the imported pest known as the gypsy moth meet with our hearty approval, and we, members of the Farmers' National Congress assembled at St. Paul, earnestly appeal to the Congress of the United States to aid our sister State in exterminating what is liable to be a national pest if neglected."

The unaided efforts of Massachusetts to check the ravages of this pest have attracted wide attention, and since all authorities agree that it is a menace not only to this State, but to all other States in the Union, we petition your honorable bodies to make an early and liberal appropriation, to be expended as you may think best, to assist in the extermination of the gypsy moth in this Commonwealth.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SEWELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report an original bill to provide for the proper handling of the increased volume of work in the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army, due to the calling out of volunteers and the increase of the Regular Army. It is a bill to meet the necessities of the war, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The bill (S. 4566) to provide for the proper handling of the increased volume of work in the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army, due to the calling out of volunteers and the increase of the Regular Army, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one assistant adjutant-general with the rank of colonel and one assistant adjutant-general with the rank of major: Provided, That the vacancy created in the grade of colonel by this act shall be filled by the promotion of officers now in the Adjutant-General's Department according to seniority, and that upon the mustering out of the volunteer forces and the reduction of the Regular Army to a peace basis no appointments shall be made in the Adjutant-General's Department until the number of officers in each grade in that Department shall be reduced to the number authorized by the law in force prior to the passage of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey an amendment of the title. I think it is a little awkward to provide for the proper handling of the increased volume of work, etc. I suggest to strike out "for the proper handling of" and make it read "to provide for the increased volume of work," etc.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to that amendment.

There being no objection, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the increased volume of work in the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army, due to the calling out of volunteers and the increase of the Regular Army."

VOLUNTEER SIGNAL CORPS.

Mr. CARTER. By direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I report a bill to organize a volunteer signal corps, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The bill (S. 4567) to organize a volunteer signal corps was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to organize a volunteer signal corps for service during the existing war, which corps shall receive the same pay and allowances as are authorized by law for the Signal Corps of the Army.

SEC. 2. The volunteer signal corps shall consist of one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, one major as disbursing officer, and such other officers and men as may be required, not exceeding one major for each Army corps, and two captains, two first lieutenants, two second lieutenants, five first-class sergeants, ten sergeants, ten corporals, and thirty first-class privates to each organized division of troops: Provided, That two-thirds of all officers below the rank of major and a like proportion of the enlisted men shall be skilled electricians or telegraph operators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 4568) granting a pension to Jacob Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 4569) for the relief of E. P. Atwood; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS (for Mr. BURROWS) introduced a bill (S. 4570) granting an increase of pension to Margaret G. White; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 4571) to extend Rhode Island avenue; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

THE TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4545) to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses; which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HARRY K. SPRING AND CHARLES W. NELSON.

Mr. WHITE submitted a resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations are instructed to forthwith investigate the cases of Harry K. Spring and Charles W. Nelson, citizens of the United States and residents of the State of California, who are under arrest in the Republic of Colombia, and to inquire whether said Spring and Nelson have been detained unreasonably without trial, or have been otherwise unlawfully restrained of their liberties, and whether the diplomatic officers and agents of the United States in said Republic of Colombia have made appropriate exertions to procure the release or trial of said accused; and to report by resolution or otherwise.

Mr. WHITE. Let the resolution be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the consideration of the bill (S. 4445) for the relief of the city of Philadelphia, which was introduced by me, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Claims, to which it properly belongs. I do not think there will be any objection to the change of reference proposed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to relieving the Committee on Finance from the bill indicated by the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears no objection, and the change of reference suggested will be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1316) to provide for organizing a naval battalion in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed with amendments the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 1910) conferring on the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to take proof of the execution of wills affecting real estate, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 4468) to provide for a volunteer brigade of engineers and an additional force of 10,000 enlisted men specially accustomed to tropical climates; and

A bill (S. 4518) to provide assistance to the inhabitants of Cuba, and arms, munitions, and military stores to the insurgent forces, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 9068) to authorize Commissioners of the District of Columbia to extinguish alley in square 465;

A bill (H. R. 9356) for the relief of Anna Merkel; and

A bill (H. R. 10209) to repeal an act of Congress, approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 260) tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore George Dewey, United States Navy, and to the officers and men of the squadron under his command; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 10251) fixing the number of rear-admirals in the United States Navy.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY. Senate bill 4468 has just come over from the House amended. It is a bill concerning the brigade of engineers and the force of 10,000 immunes, so called. The Committee on Military Affairs has had the amendments under consideration and instructed me to ask that the Senate concur with the amendments made by the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4468) to provide for a volunteer brigade of engineers and an additional force of 10,000 enlisted men specially accustomed to tropical climates.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were, on page 2, line 7, after the word "empowered," to insert "during the present war;" on page 2, after line 13, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. The provisions of the act of April 22, 1898, which provide that volunteers called out by proclamation of the President shall be apportioned to the several States, and the provisions of said act which provide that the governors of the States shall appoint officers shall not apply to this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments are before the Senate. What motion is made in reference to them?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will briefly explain the amendments. The House of Representatives seemed to think that there was a possibility of a misconstruction of the act raising the volunteer force and somebody might be asking to have these immunes called for from the States, in which case the governors of the States would have the appointment of the officers. But it would be very inconvenient, probably, to call for them from the different States. They will be picked up as they may be reached or as they may come in. It was the desire of the House to secure the appointment of those officers by the President instead of attempting to have the governors appoint officers in fractions of regiments.

I do not know that I make myself understood, but the intention is to have the President appoint the officers of the brigade of engineers and the immune force, because these troops can not be very well apportioned among the States and the governors can not very well do it. For fear of controversy, the House, out of abundant caution, added section 3. We did not think it absolutely necessary ourselves, but to prevent all possibility of doubt we recommend concurring with the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut moves to concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BACON. As I understand the bill, the troops to be raised under it are not to be called for by the States.

Mr. HAWLEY. They are not.

Mr. BACON. But the President has it in his discretion to raise them by such means as he deems best, regardless of State lines.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. BACON. And the President will have the appointment of the officers.

Mr. HAWLEY. And to make it certain this section 3 is added. Some one in the House (I might name a very distinguished gentleman from the southwestern part of the country) raised a doubt about it, and finally a gentleman well qualified to judge in those matters moved this section, as I said, through abundant caution. The officers of the brigade of engineers and the 10,000 immunes will be appointed by the President.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut one question. I understand it is contemplated that these troops shall serve only during the war, and that they will be disbanded after the war, like the volunteers.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, yes; it is not an addition to the permanent force, but is like all the rest of the Volunteer Army.

Mr. PASCO. It is a temporary addition for war purposes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Quite so.

Mr. PASCO. That is my understanding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

The amendments were concurred in.

DISTRICT NAVAL BATTALION.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1316) to provide for organizing a naval battalion in the District of Columbia having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments.

EUGENE HALE,
WILLIAM E. CHANDLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

S. G. HILBORN,
G. E. FOSS,
ADOLPH MEYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to ask if it is proposed to organize a naval battalion only in the District of Columbia?

Mr. HALE. This measure applies only to the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILSON. Is there any provision of law or any act pending that will permit the organization of a naval battalion in any other portion of the country?

Mr. HALE. There is a general bill, which has been reported in the House and is now on the Calendar of the House, providing for a general organization throughout the country, but in this case the committee deemed it necessary to provide for the District of Columbia. The organization is ready for service.

Mr. WILSON. The reason why I inquire is because we are very anxious on our coast to organize a naval battalion for service on that coast. There seems to be no provision by which they can do so. If there is a necessity for a naval battalion, which I doubt not is the case, it would seem that there ought to be some provision whereby we can create such an organization on the Pacific coast.

Mr. HALE. That feeling is by no means confined to the Pacific coast. I know that in my own State it is very strong.

Mr. WILSON. I have no doubt, as the Senator states, that it is very strong in his State. Yet we have here a bill going through the two Houses to organize a naval battalion in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHANDLER rose.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me, without very much information, and I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will give me information, that it rises almost to an absurdity.

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg leave to state to the Senator from Washington that as I understand the bill it is a mere local bill authorizing a part of the militia of the District of Columbia to form a naval battalion. The naval militia of the States as now organized everywhere is only a part of the militia, and each State can organize a naval battalion to-day. Almost all the States have done so. The General Government has done nothing for them except to furnish them some boats and some little naval equipment, but they are a part, in all the States, of the militia of the State. This is simply a local bill authorizing as a part of the militia of the District of Columbia a naval battalion here. If I am wrong, the Senator from Maine will correct me when I say that there is nothing to hinder the organization to-day of a naval battalion as a part of the militia of the State of Washington. Whether it will be called into the service of the United States or not is a further question.

Mr. HALE. That can be done by any State, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, through its own authority and legislation. We are doing this for the District because the District is the same to us that the States are to their respective governments and legislatures. But in addition to that, as I have already said, there has been a bill prepared providing for a naval auxiliary force, which will cover and include these organizations outside the militia, so that they will have more advantages and the Government will do more for them and will receive them and assign them service. The purpose of the committee here is that as soon as that bill reaches the Senate, which I suppose will be in a few days, to ask action upon it.

Mr. WILSON. I hope so, because we need such legislation.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to state to my friend from Washington that California has a naval brigade, and the Government placed at their disposal one of our Government vessels not in service. It comprises several hundred bright young sailormen, and only day before yesterday, on behalf of the naval reserve, I tendered their services to the Government. I doubt not that Washington has the same opportunity and the same law. I know she has the right material to establish a naval reserve and form a battalion that will compare favorably with any that can be organized in the District of Columbia or even in the golden State of California.

Mr. WILSON. I have no doubt that is true; but unfortunately for me I am not upon the Committee on Appropriations and have not had placed in the appropriation bill an item of $50,000 for the creation of a naval station in the State of Washington, as there is an appropriation of that amount for a naval station in the State of California, for an auxiliary, or whatever they may term it, upon an island a distance from the mainland. The Senator from California by his energy and zeal has made proper provision in that respect; but we hope at an early day to be as successful and to secure something. We have a large body of men who are fishermen and adapted to this service, and we think we might be able to create a naval auxiliary in the Pacific Northwest, although I sometimes doubt my ability to overcome the fact that California, by reason of having a very energetic member upon the Committee on Appropriations and on the Naval Affairs Committee, seems to secure everything in that direction. We have a very fine dry dock, I will say to the Senator from California, probably the finest upon the Pacific coast; but whenever we want a vessel docked, we are compelled to go to Mare Island, although if a storm should occur while one of the vessels was in Mare Island it could never get out.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, my friend the Senator from Washington is usually correct, but in this instance I think he is a little off his course, to use a nautical term.

Mr. WILSON. I have never been in a service of that kind, and the Senator has.

Mr. PERKINS. The naval battalion of California has never received one dollar of Government aid for its support; and if my friend from Washington had been as zealous in forming a naval brigade on Puget Sound, the finest inland sheet of water in the world, as he has been in Indian affairs in his State and in creating reservations, I doubt not he would have had a brigade that would have compared favorably with that of the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

The recent station established for apprentices on the Pacific coast, I am frank to admit, has been one of my hobbies. I believe the way to have an American Navy, to have ships built by American mechanics, and manned by American seamen, is to commence with the boys and discipline them in the naval schools and on board ship. Having that object in view, and my friend from Washington being so engrossed with Indian affairs that he could not give that attention which he otherwise would have done, I am sure, I had the honor of introducing a bill, which is now a law upon our statute book; and I am happy to inform my friend that out of the 350 boys who have been enrolled and enlisted as apprentices in that naval school, 80 come from the State of Washington, and there are some 30 more applications from that State, and as soon as the school is completed we shall receive them and, I hope, many more.

But this, Mr. President, has nothing whatever to do with the State military battalion. That is a State organization. The District of Columbia to-day, as I understand, having provided for its battalion, is simply doing what the State of Washington has done for her naval militia, what California has done, and what most of the other coast States of the Union have done.

I am always ready to join hands with my friend from Washington. In fact the only way to get anything for the Pacific coast is to cooperate jointly and work together for the general welfare of our coast and the great Northwest. There is no jealousy, but rather a spirit of emulation of who can do the most and the best for his particular locality. Therefore there is no chance for any difference between my friend from Washington and myself.

He lives in the great Northwest, and the committee of which I have the honor to be a member has worked zealously that we might have naval vessels to be anchored on Puget Sound, to there guard our great Northwest territory and support our dry dock. It is full of vessels all the time. Only to-day I have before me on my desk a telegram asking its use for an auxiliary cruiser, one that is on the list at least of our Government, and consent has been given. The Senator does not know what good he is doing. He has builded better than he knew. That dry dock is not only a great benefit to our Navy, but to the commerce of the Pacific coast. There is no difference between my friend and me.

Mr. WILSON. Before the Senator takes his seat, I wish to say that he has overlooked one important matter, and that is that two of the vessels, the Oregon, which is on its way and now coming up the Atlantic coast, and which we hope will reach its destination, and the Olympia, were built on the Pacific coast. The latter is one of the strongest vessels of her class in the service. Of course the distinguished Senator from California is aware of that fact.

I find with that zeal, with that energy, with that industry that is so commendable on the part of the Senator—that while we have, as he says, the finest body of inland water probably in the known world, and while we have the finest dry dock, I think, which has been constructed in years by the Government, capable of taking into it any ship or man-of-war now afloat, unfortunately for us, by some method, by some means, by some energy (perhaps by the Senator from California), whenever any of those vessels are to be docked, they never find their way into the dock at Puget Sound. One of them did get in, but we had to send down to California to get the workmen to come up from Mare Island, because no provision had been made for us.

I do not believe any Senator on this floor will accuse me of not asking for things. I do not think anybody will lay that charge at my door. I have simply haunted the Committee on Appropriations; I have done the best I could, and have secured for the years to come and for the years that are gone about $800,000 for our dock on Puget Sound; but I should like to get at some place, at some time, I do not care how far in the future, one of our American men-of-war docked in that dock, with a sufficient number of mechanics located there to attend to her needs. I do not want them all to go to Mare Island, for I am afraid if a storm occurs while they are there they will never be able to get out, unless we dredge out the dock beforehand. But that is amply provided for in the sundry civil appropriation bill, which is due largely to the energy, zeal, and industry of the distinguished Senator from California.

We have a magnificent dock, and at some future time we hope American men-of-war, especially one of those named for our State, built upon the Pacific coast, may have an opportunity to go there, and see if we can not do something with it. We have a magnificent inland sea, as the Senator says, and I hope at some time we may be able to create this naval auxiliary reserve. When a law is passed by Congress, as I hope it will be at an early day, I think, as stated by the Senator from California, it will be found our people will not go to his place, but will stay in the State of Washington. We are very patriotic, and I am glad to have his statement that the State of Washington is furnishing a goodly portion of the crews of boys for this service.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

EXECUTION OF WILLS IN THE DISTRICT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1910) conferring on the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to take proof of the execution of wills affecting real estate, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 9068) to authorize Commissioners of the District of Columbia to extinguish alley in square 465;

A bill (H. R. 9856) for the relief of Anna Merkel; and

A bill (H. R. 10209) to repeal an act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," and for other purposes.

NELLIE GRANT SARTORIS.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 238) to readmit Nellie Grant Sartoris to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I desire to say that a joint resolution precisely similar to the joint resolution which has just been read was passed on the same day that this joint resolution was passed in the House of Representatives, but a little earlier in the day. It appears that the joint resolution of the Senate is now referred to a committee in the House, and this joint resolution has been lying here on the table for several days. I therefore ask that action be taken on it at the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is asked for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. QUAY. What joint resolution is that?

Mr. GALLINGER. It will take but a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a joint resolution to readmit Nellie Grant Sartoris to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL. It will not take any time, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to call up the Post-Office appropriation bill; but if this takes no time I shall not object to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to a question of order. Morning business is not yet concluded, and I have a small resolution in my hands, which I have held here for half an hour or more.

Mr. QUAY. I will yield to that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the morning business ought to be concluded, and so declared by the Chair, before other business is taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business has not been concluded.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think, under the unanimous-consent agreement yesterday, we had a right to have the Post-Office appropriation bill taken up as soon as the Senate convened. We agreed to vote at 2 o'clock, and of course the implied understanding is that the intervening time, if any Senator desires to speak, shall be given to a discussion of that bill.

Mr. QUAY. That was not part of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CHANDLER. My point of order is not good, if there was a unanimous-consent agreement to proceed with the Post-Office appropriation bill during the morning hour and before the morning business was concluded. I was not aware of any such agreement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has not been informed, nor does he find in the RECORD that any such agreement was made after he left the chair last evening.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Then I wish to know of the Chair if the entire time can be exhausted until 2 o'clock, when we shall be obliged to vote at once on the Post-Office appropriation bill. Is that the understanding?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair knows of no rule of the Senate nor of any unanimous-consent agreement made yesterday which dispenses with morning business.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have the unanimous-consent agreement read.

Mr. QUAY. There was no arrangement for the taking up of the bill or for a discussion of it. The unanimous-consent agreement was simply that the bill and the amendments then pending should be voted on at 2 o'clock to-day.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have the agreement stated from the desk.

Mr. QUAY. It is absolutely fair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] that they should, if they wish, have an opportunity to discuss their amendments to the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. CULLOM. Here is what the RECORD shows——

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, the Senator from North Carolina thinks an hour at least will be required, in his judgment, for the discussion of the pending proposition, and I think it is only fair that we give him that opportunity, as he has occupied so little of the time of the Senate during the discussion.

Mr. CULLOM. This is the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]——

Mr. QUAY. I remember it distinctly. There was nothing at all as to the time of taking up the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I will read the unanimous-consent agreement as proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania. It is as follows:

I will now suggest that, by unanimous consent, the bill and amendment go over and the vote be taken at 2 o'clock to-morrow. It is evident that we have not a voting quorum of the Senate present, and the Senate is at the mercy of any one man.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the pending bill may go over until to-morrow and that a final vote on amendments and the bill be taken at 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. QUAY. I insist on my motion, which will dispose of this discussion.

Mr. CHANDLER. I make the point of order that it is not in order to move to take up a bill until the morning business has been declared closed by the Chair.

Mr. QUAY. I think the morning business has been declared closed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business has not been concluded. The call has not been concluded for concurrent and other resolutions.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know if it is not in order at any time after 1 o'clock to move to take up a bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not until after 2 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] for morning business.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What is the ruling of the Chair?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The ruling of the Chair is that he recognizes the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], for what particular purpose he does not know.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, if the motion is in order——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator is speaking in the time of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the motion is in order to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, I should like to have it put to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No such motion can be made except with the assent of the Senator from New Hampshire, who has been recognized by the Chair, and who has the floor. Other Senators are speaking by his courtesy.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator from New Hampshire would have been through by this time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes. The resolution is not of importance, except that I have held it in my hand without putting it in out of order, so as to put it in when it was in order. Now I have the right to put it in, but I will withhold it until to-morrow, in order that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] may continue the debate on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9008) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] said he would kindly yield to me for a moment for another one of these very brief Army bills.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall object to the consideration of any other measure whatever. There are several requests of that kind, and we have but fifty-five minutes left for the discussion of this question, and I shall insist on it being used for that purpose. After that I shall not object to the Senator's bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Post-Office appropriation bill is before the Senate, and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned yesterday afternoon we had under consideration the amendment to limit the scope of the proposed investigation to the question of railway-mail pay and postal-car rent. Every Senator on this floor knows that if he is put on the committee of investigation—and this amendment provides that three Senators shall serve on the committee—there is not a Senator who can give the question of mail pay alone as full consideration as ought to be given to it during the recess, unless he devotes his entire time to it; and yet the proposition is to extend that investigation to everything from the beginning of the work of the Post-Office Department to the end of it.

At the suggestion of several Senators, who think that all of these questions should be investigated, I ask to modify my amendment so as to provide for two committees, one committee to investigate the question of railroad pay for mail by weight and postal-car service, and the proper rent for the same, and the other committee to investigate all the other questions raised in this proposed amendment offered by the Committee on Appropriations.

I offer the following amendment, therefore, which is a substitute for section 5:

That two joint committees, each consisting of two members of the Senate and three members of the House, shall be appointed by the Senate and House, one committee to investigate, during the coming recess of Congress, the question whether or not excessive prices are paid to the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails and as compensation for postal-car service, and the other committee all sources of revenue and all expenditures of the postal service and rates of postage upon all postal matter, the expenses of said joint committees to be paid, one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House, upon vouchers to be approved by the two chairmen.

Mr. President, that provides for an investigation of all these questions, but it provides for two committees. It provides for a division of the work. This modification is made at the suggestion of Senators who realize that one committee can not do it all, but who at the same time would like to see all of these questions investigated. With these modifications of the amendment, I do not feel that it is necessary to discuss it further, because it must meet the desire of every Senator who wants a thorough investigation of any or all of these questions.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] stated yesterday afternoon that they thought all these questions ought to be investigated. I have no objection to investigating them all, but I want an investigation that is an investigation. I want one committee to give its entire time to the questions of railroad pay and postal-car service, for I want the facts. I think I have them, but the majority of the Senate decided yesterday that they wanted an investigation of this question of railway pay for mail by a special committee. Then let us have such an investigation, and let us have another committee to investigate the other question which some Senators want investigated. Surely no one can object to that. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he is willing to accept this modified amendment to provide for two committees to cover the entire question?

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I do not feel authorized to accept the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina. It is contrary to the policy of the Senate and contrary to the interest of the Government to multiply committees and to have them roving throughout the country during the recess at the expense of the Government on the whim of any member of this Senate. There has been great complaint among the people about it, and, for one, I do not propose to encourage it.

Further, Mr. President, I have no doubt at all that under this fifth section a committee can be raised which will be entirely competent to deal with all these questions, and that a report can be made prior to the time when the next Post-Office appropriation bill comes before us. There will be no difficulty in reaching, within sixty days after this committee enters upon its duties, every person and every document that can throw any light on these subjects. So I can not accept the suggestion of the Senator. I have no objection, however, to striking out the entire section and allowing the Committees on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the two Houses to act as a joint committee to investigate all these questions, so that the Committee on Appropriations will be relieved entirely from their consideration. If that will suit the Senator, I will move to strike out section 5.

Mr. BUTLER. That suggestion would satisfy me because, to my mind, the facts are sufficiently before the Senate now to justify a reduction; but I do not think that it will satisfy the Senate, because the facts presented on yesterday—facts which were not answered, facts which no Senator here, I say confidently, will seriously attempt to reply to—were stated, and the Senate preferred to have the investigation, in spite of those facts which were presented, before voting to reduce the railroad pay. The vote of the Senate yesterday indicated that Senators wanted an investigation. If we have an investigation, let it be one that will bring out the facts. I do not want to cut down the pay of the railroads if the facts will not justify it. All I want is the facts; and, with the facts before the Senate, I want the Senate to act in accordance with them. If we can protect the public Treasury and do justice to the corporations which are carrying the mails and not affect the postal service, then all of us should certainly desire to do so.

But, Mr. President, if you put all this work on one committee, there is not a committee you can select which can afford the time to cover all the questions provided for in that section, and the investigation will be a farce, however honest, however sincere, and however zealous may be the efforts of the Senators on the committee. Two committees may be able to investigate all of these questions, but surely one committee can not and will not. Surely the Senate does not want a sham investigation. Surely the Senate wants the facts. If so, let us go to work and get them. I am satisfied with the facts before the Senate until they are refuted.

I presented facts here yesterday from Poor's Railroad Manual to show that we are paying forty-two times as much for mail as the average paid for freight; facts to show that we are paying ten times as much for mail as the express companies charge for express matter; facts to show that we pay nearly twice as much for carrying the mail as each passenger pays to have himself transported on the best cars the railroad companies furnish. Those facts were not questioned, and they will not be questioned, and yet Senators said they wanted an investigation. If we are to have it, let it be a fair one; let it be thorough; let two committees take charge of these matters and go to the bottom of them, and show whether the facts I presented yesterday are correct or not. Let them prove that Poor's Railroad Manual is incorrect if they can do it, and if not, let the Senate act upon that information.

Mr. President, the Senate voted yesterday not to reduce the pay, but a majority of the Senate, I think, believes it should be reduced; but Senators did not know how much, though in their own minds they were satisfied there should be some reduction, and the vote of the Senate means that they want an investigation. Now, let us have it; and let it be an honest and fair one to all interests. The facts are all I want, and therefore I have offered the amendment for the two committees—one to investigate the railroad pay and the postal-car service, and one to investigate all the other questions.

Mr. President, while I am on the floor—and unless it becomes necessary I will not speak further on this amendment—I give notice that before we take a final vote on the pending bill I shall move to strike out, on page 9, from and including line 8 down to and including line 10.

Mr. MASON. Read it.

Mr. BUTLER. It is the provision for a subsidy for alleged fast-mail service South.

Yesterday we were told by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] and other Senators that we ought to follow the recommendation of the Department in these matters where we did not have positive advice and clear and unquestioned proof to the contrary. I want to see to-day if the Senator from Pennsylvania will stand by his statement. I want to see if he will stand by the recommendations made by the Department for eight or ten years. I have all the reports here. I will begin with 1890 and see what the Postmaster-General has recommended. Remember, Mr. President, that we are paying 6 cents a pound to carry the mail. We are paying for postal cars each year for rent more than it cost to build them, and in addition it is proposed here to vote a subsidy. What does the Postmaster-General say about it?

Mr. MASON. May I ask a question without interrupting the Senator?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. When the Senator says we are paying more than the cost of building the cars, does that include the cost of hauling?

Mr. BUTLER. It is estimated that the cost for repairs, light, heat, soap, towels, and everything for a postal car is $720. That is the estimate which the Department makes. The railroads claim $750 a year. The postal cars in use number 654; those held in reserve, 173; in all, 827. Now, estimating the cost of each at $4,000, which the Department says is too high, we find that the value of the cars now is $3,308,000. We appropriate in this bill $4,000,000 for the rent of those cars, while only about three-fourth of them are in use.

Mr. MASON. The Senator does not seem to catch my point. He makes a statement which excludes the hauling of the car.

Mr. BUTLER. We pay 6 cents a pound for the hauling of mail. Whenever you ship a bale of cotton do you pay rent for the car it is carried on? No. You simply pay your freight.

Mr. MASON. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. BUTLER. We pay 6 cents a pound to carry the mail. This is an enormous price, at least 40 per cent too high, and the railroads certainly should furnish the car service. The 6 cents a pound we pay for every pound of mail is ten times as high as express charges, forty-two times as high as freight charges, and nearly twice as high as we pay for passenger service. Each pound of passenger goes for 3½ cents a pound or a little less. In addition to this, we are charged car rent. How much rent do we pay? We pay more rent each year for the cars, in addition to the 6 cents a pound, than it would cost to buy them. The cars in use are worth less than $3,000,000, yet we pay $4,000,000 rent for them each year. These cars last for more than twenty years, so before these cars wear out we will pay about $80,000,000 rent for them.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand the Senator from North Carolina to state to the Senator from Illinois that the railroad companies, in addition to receiving this $4,000,000 for the postal-car service, the special appropriation, also receive pay for transporting every pound of mail that is carried on those cars the same as if it were carried in an ordinary car.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. They get double pay, I understand the Senator to assert.

Mr. BUTLER. They get double pay.

Mr. CHANDLER. First, for transporting the mail matter at so much a pound, and next, for furnishing the postal cars in which it is transported; and the Senator says that this extra amount paid for the postal cars each year is equal to the total cost of the cars.

Mr. BUTLER. More than the total cost.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand that to be the fact.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the fact. The rent we pay is more than the cost of building every car in use and building better cars and handsomer cars, according to every estimate of their value.

Mr. MASON. In other words, the Senator makes this statement, if I understand him correctly, that we pay for the transportation so much a pound.

Mr. BUTLER. About 6 cents a pound.

Mr. MASON. And in addition thereto we pay for the rental of the car more each year than the car cost.

Mr. BUTLER. Exactly. That is what I state, and nobody will question it.

Mr. MASON. I think the Senator is mistaken about some of the figures given.

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all. I have the report of the Postmaster-General which I can read. The extract was put into the RECORD yesterday evening. It is in this morning's RECORD.

Mr. MASON. I am not prepared to take the time now——

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will turn to page 4721, commencing about halfway down the first column, he will see the statement taken from the Postmaster-General's report. I will read it:

I wish to say that in the inquiry—

This is what Mr. Vilas says about the inquiry that the Department made when he was Postmaster-General—

I wish to say that in the inquiry I had to make then I had the aid of as accomplished, skillful business and expert railroad man as I believe there is to be found, and as the result I reported at that time.

This is an extract from his report, and it is as follows:

Careful inquiry discloses that very many of these cars, such as they are, would not cost to build $3,000 each; that the best 50-foot cars can be built for $4,000 to $4,500 each; a new 60-foot car, equal to the most complete and handsome now in the service, for not over $4,600, and that taking together all the post-office cars in the United States, their average value does not, probably, exceed $3,500.

There were 342 postal cars in use and 90 in reserve at that time.

Mr. Vilas called the attention of Congress to the fact that every one of those cars can be built for $1,600,000, and that if you add $720 a year for repairs, light, heat, towels, soap, and everything, it will make $246,000 more; in all, $1,846,240 for the cost of the cars, keeping them in repair, and furnishing them with heat, light, towels, soap, and everything for a year. Yet that year Congress appropriated $2,000,000 rent, and the Postmaster-General—I put it all in the RECORD yesterday—called attention to the fact and says that the rent is not only outrageous, but that clearly the Government should own its cars, for they would last twenty years, and then we would simply pay the railroads so much to haul them, no matter how much mail was on them or how little, and he shows how that would save millions upon millions each year to the Government.

Mr. MASON. What Postmaster-General's report is that?

Mr. BUTLER. Postmaster-General Vilas; and when he was in the Senate he made a speech here, and that is quoted from in my speech yesterday, covering the same facts and bringing them up to date.

Mr. MASON. I do not understand the Senator to claim that, having furnished cars built expressly for this work, the railroads should haul the mail on the fast trains, furnishing accommodations for the Government employees, at the same rate that they carry freight.

Mr. BUTLER. When we pay 6 cents a pound for carrying mail, which is forty-two times the average charge for freight, this is a price high enough to enable the railroads to have cars furnished more sumptuously than any Pullman car the world ever saw, and without charging any extra rent for them. I will answer the question in another way——

Mr. MASON. I wish the Senator would. Does he not expect that we should pay a different rate than freight pays in a freight car?

Mr. BUTLER. I offered an amendment yesterday providing for a reduction in the pay per pound of 20 per cent. Then I offered another amendment recognizing the difference in freight and postal car service. The amendment provided we should pay a rent on every one of these cars equal to 10 per cent of their value. In short, the cars, including those in use and in reserve, are worth $3,309,000. I offered an amendment providing for 10 per cent of that amount to be paid in rent each year, which would make $330,900 a year; and also to pay in addition $750 a year for repairs, lighting, heating, etc., for each car, making $485,500, which in all makes $865,050 for the use of these cars each year. Then I just raised the amount to make it ample to $1,000,000 for rent; in other words, 25 per cent rent on the cost of the cars, and the Senate voted it down. I suppose the Senate did not listen. The Senator from Illinois is recorded against it either by pair or vote. He did not hear the argument.

Mr. MASON. My attention being called to the fact, I did have a pair yesterday, the first one I ever had in my life. I should have voted, as I usually do, to carry out the recommendation of the committee of the Senate having the matter in charge. I was absent yesterday and was paired to sustain the action of my committee, but I am anxious to know the facts, as the Senate will bear me out, as I stood by the committee largely upon the statement that there was to be a thorough investigation as to what was fair and right.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the Senator would like to see an investigation of this matter?

Mr. MASON. I should like to see the investigation suggested by the committee; not to investigate one thing, but all of them.

Mr. QUAY. This is one of the subjects to be investigated.

Mr. BUTLER. I have offered an amendment providing for two committees, because the Senator knows that if he were put on this committee it would be beyond human possibility to get at the facts of everything covered in this amendment. I have therefore provided for two committees, one to investigate the question of railroad pay and the postal-car service, and another committee to take up all the other questions; and I submit that if we are to have an investigation, that is the only way that Senators can do themselves justice and arrive at the facts, if they will give their whole time to it.

Mr. MASON. Pardon me if I make an inquiry. I desire to know whether the Senate did not vote down the amendment which sought to limit the investigation to the railroads?

Mr. BUTLER. I think not.

Mr. MASON. I was so informed.

Mr. BUTLER. When we adjourned yesterday that question was pending.

Mr. MASON. It has not been voted upon?

Mr. BUTLER. It has not been voted upon.

This diversion has brought out some facts which probably were overlooked yesterday, but I return to my proposed amendment in reference to special mail facilities. I had just stated that we paid this enormous price for carrying the mail, this enormous price for car service, more than the cars were worth, and then called attention to the fact that in addition here is a subsidy which this bill proposes to vote over and above the enormous price for car service and for weight. I called attention to the fact that the committee yesterday appealed to us to stand by the Department and its recommendations. What does the Department say about this subsidy? I read now from the report of the Postmaster-General for 1890:

The extent and character of the ordinary mail service throughout the entire country within the past few years has been greatly advanced, and the growth of the mails has added largely to the compensation of the railroads.

In my judgment the ordinary compensation now allowed by law should secure from railroads hearty cooperation with the Department in the establishment of such schedules as will accomplish a maximum amount of good mail service, and whenever this is done the compensation is sure to be advanced, occasioned by the natural increase in the quantity of mails transported.

I ask the Secretary to read the remainder of the extract, beginning on page 268. I have marked where I stopped.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The railroads associated with all large cities and trade centers of the country have an interest, independent of the compensation allowed directly by the Government, in cooperating with the Post-Office Department in its efforts to expedite the distribution of newspapers to the outlying districts early in the morning, and in the quickening of commercial mails after the close of each day's business, and it ought to be possible, within a very few years, to dispense altogether with preferential allowances for special facilities, and still be within the power of the Department to maintain and further advance the high standard that has been reached by the Railway Mail Service train schedules that now prevail.

In dwelling so fully upon the subject of allowances for special facilities I do not wish to be understood as criticising the occasion which first led to the granting of them.

I believe at the outstart such payments were a necessity, especially in connection with the establishment, via the Atlantic Coast Line and Tampa, of a reliable and quick mail service between New York (as the base) and Havana, but I do not see the justification for continuing indefinitely to this line, any more than to others, an allowance for a special train schedule and at the same time, owing to the constant increase of the quantity of the mails, keep adding to the compensation at each quadrennial weighing of the route.

If at the end of two years all of the special allowance is withdrawn, each of the roads will still be receiving for mail transportation more than was allowed by the combining of the regular with the special compensation at the inception of the special service.

Mr. BUTLER. That is from the report of 1890. Every report right straight along, without a break, takes the same position making the argument, if anything, stronger. Here is the report of 1891. I ask the Secretary to read from page 69 the paragraph marked.

The Secretary read as follows:

NO RAILROAD BONUS NEEDED.

In 1879, when railroad facilities were few and train service slow, Congress appropriated $295,000 in extra allowances for such railroad companies as could not afford to make schedules sufficiently numerous or fast. These sums were to be in addition to the payments of ordinary rates for railroad transportation. The quantity of mail matter was then perhaps one-half of what it is now, so that each of the companies, by the natural growth of mail transportation, has, since 1879, doubled its revenue from mail pay. At each weighing, moreover, there is a further increase of pay, according to the increase of service. In view of this fact, and because abundant facilities were to be had without granting extra pay, and because of the frequent charge by railroad companies giving similar service without extra pay that the Department was discriminating against them, I have concluded henceforth to remove the embarrassments, so far as lies in my power, by not including in the budget for the next year any estimate for special facilities. This course, if approved, places all the transportation companies on exactly the same basis of pay.

Mr. PASCO. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. I can not very well yield. My time is limited.

Mr. PASCO. I merely wish to ask a question. I desire to ask the Senator whether these statements are not altogether inconsistent with the action of the Postmasters-General. When these appropriations are coupled with the proviso that no part of the appropriation shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary to promote the interest of the postal service, why does the Postmaster-General spend the money if, in his opinion, according to the statements which the Senator is having read, the expenditure is not necessary?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Florida is a gentleman of intelligence. He has a great deal of intelligence. He should know the answer to that question without asking the question. I must presume that the Senator is fair and that he does not want to be a partisan here for the Southern Railroad Company or any other railroad company, but if the Senator had read all of the reports with the same diligence that he has read this proviso here and seen what the Postmaster-General himself says about it, he would have had his own answer and would have been prepared to vote to protect the Treasury instead of making a gift to one of the great railroad monopolies that is owned by the Rothschilds, of England, and is to-day one of the most powerful political influences in the South.

To-day the railroad that gets this subsidy is not run as a business concern, but is run as a political machine in every State through which it goes; and if the Senator dares to vote to protect the Treasury, he will feel the sting of that corporation. The Senator will find that company using its influence against him in every convention and at every crossroad. It is run as a political machine in my State. It is the most powerful factor in keeping monopoly and gold enthroned. It is run for that purpose largely in Southern States.

Mr. PASCO. The Senator does not answer my question. My question was why the Postmaster-General has advised that this fund is not necessary and then when we place it subject to his disposition and his discretion always consumes it. We all know about the railroad companies. It is unnecessary to make a speech about them, but I want to trace this thing up with the Postmaster-General, and I want to know what influence prompts him and induces him to spend this money when it is made subject to his discretion. Why, after he says it is not necessary, and after Congress has vested him with that discretion, does he consume it in this way? That is the point to which I hope the Senator will direct his answer. I know all about the railroads.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator does, I hope he will be governed accordingly. But now I will give him the specific information he wants. If he will read the reports, he will find that one Postmaster-General after another called attention to this and recommended for years and years that this paragraph should be stricken out. In 1895 the Postmaster-General said:

In submitting estimates for the fiscal years 1893-94, 1895-96, this office has declined to include the item of special facilities for the reasons heretofore stated.

They have argued it page after page. Congress paid no attention to it. It seems when we get to this item every time the wishes of the railroads are more important than the recommendations of the Department, and Heaven knows the Department has never been accused of being hostile to the railroads. That is not all. Here is the report of the Postmaster-General for 1896. What does he say?

Congress has appropriated each year during the last twenty years a specialty fund for a fast-mail service from New England and New York to Southern States, reaching as far south as New Orleans. The total amount for the current year is $196,614.22.

There has been a difference of opinion as to the necessity for making these appropriations, but as each Congress has seen proper—to follow the action of the former Congress, the Department, while not recommending the appropriation, has thought it advisable to apply the fund for the purpose indicated.

In defiance of the recommendation of the Department—

Each time the Department has recommended against it. Each time the Department has argued it up to this report. Here the Postmaster-General says we have recommended each time that Congress leave it out; each time Congress puts it in, and therefore the Department must take it as the deliberate instruction of Congress. Why does Congress vote this subsidy when the Department shows there is no necessity for it, when the Postmaster-General shows that we can get just as good service, just as fast trains without it? It is wasting money, wasting money, and making a clear donation to the railroad companies. Just as well make a direct appropriation to the goldbug campaign fund.

I ask the Secretary to read what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General says:

The Secretary read as follows:

No recommendation has been made for the customary special-facility allowance for the next fiscal year, because I do not believe there exists occasion for perpetuating the preferential method whereby a limited number of railroads would be paid both ordinary and special transportation and full car compensation, while other railroads, performing precisely the same character of service, can be allowed nothing more than the compensation which we are by statute permitted to pay for ordinary transportation.

The continuance of the special-facility allowance has for some years past been the source of much annoyance to the Department and has hampered the best interests of the mail service, because railroads operating in contiguous territory and to some extent paralleling the roads which receive the extra pay object to rendering equally good or quicker schedule mail service except they be paid corresponding rates. They ask that all be treated alike.

When the special-facility payments were first started, it was well understood that they were but temporary, so as to bridge over a period until the natural growth of the mails would yield sufficient compensation to do away with occasion for additional allowances. This was as far back as 1879, since which time the aggregate yearly compensation to the railroads drawing the special facility allowances for ordinary mail and car transportation, independent of the special service, has more than doubled, so that ordinary compensation, even after the reduction of this year, will be greatly in excess of ordinary and special compensation added together ten years ago; and as most of the special-facility routes will have their compensation readjusted commencing with July 1, 1892, when their pay, it is estimated, will be increased still further at least 20 per cent, this office has not felt satisfied in recommending the continuance after June 30, 1892, of any portion of the present special-facility allowance.

Mr. BUTLER. I will now read from the next report. It is short, and I will read it myself. On page 178 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1894 there is this statement:

In submitting the estimates for the fiscal years of 1893, 1894, and 1895 this office declined to include the item of "special facilities" for reasons heretofore stated. No estimate is submitted for the next year."

The report for 1895 I read a moment ago to the Senator from Florida, in answer to his question. Here is the report for 1896——

Mr. PASCO. I should like to suggest to the Senator to have these statements printed, so that all the time for discussion may not be taken up in that way. There are others who would like to make a few remarks as well as the Senator from North Carolina, and he is consuming the whole time in reading matters which we can read in the RECORD later. There is only fifteen minutes of the time left now, and he ought not to consume the entire time remaining.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator has just shown such a want of information on this question that if I do not read these reports now he will vote without proper knowledge. The RECORD will be read to-morrow. We must vote to-day. These reports from the Post-Office Department are the very thing I am basing this amendment on. The Senator from Florida has shown he is absolutely ignorant about them, and yet he wants me to stick it in the RECORD and let him vote blindfolded. I will not do it. He must vote with his eyes open.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SPECIAL FACILITIES.

Congress has appropriated each year during the last twenty years a specialty fund for a fast-mail service from New England and New York to Southern States, reaching as far south as New Orleans. The total amount for the current year is $196,614.22.

There has been a difference of opinion as to the necessity for making these appropriations, but as each Congress has seen proper to follow the action of the former Congress, the Department, while not recommending the appropriation, has thought it advisable to apply the fund for the purpose indicated.

Mr. BUTLER. There is another answer to the Senator's question from the Postmaster-General's report. Now, here is the last report coming down to date. I will myself read this. It is short. The Postmaster-General says, on page 179:

SPECIAL FACILITIES.

In submitting the estimates for several years past this office has declined to include the item of "special facilities"— for reasons heretofore stated, but appropriations have, however, been made.

That is, the subsidy—

He goes on to give the same reason, that he would give the money to the railroads if Congress instructed him to do so by voting it after he recommended against it. But I wish to call attention specially to his conclusion. Instead of reading the whole page, I will read this closing sentence on page 180, near the bottom:

The service in general will be better if the special-facility appropriation is discontinued.

And yet we find Senators saying that we must vote that appropriation to get fast-mail facilities.

Mr. President, will Congress vote for this subsidy after all these official reports against it? But I have still further evidence to show that the subsidy is not needed. It is from the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service. He is probably more intimately connected with these facts and knows better about the schedules of the trains and whether any time was saved, whether this money was used to help the service or used as a bonus for the pockets of the great railroad corporations. Here is a letter from Mr. James E. White, the General Superintendent, addressed to a a member of the House, which I ask to have read.

Mr. MASON. That refers to just what is called the fast mail?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, the subsidy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. QUAY. That is a witness the Senator has discredited.

Mr. BUTLER. I quote him, because the Senator from Pennsylvania says that he is good authority.

Mr. QUAY. Yes; and the Senator discredited him.

The Secretary read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1898.

SIR: Replying to your letter of January 29 to the Postmaster-General asking for "the schedules of the mails on all through lines running from Boston and New York to Atlanta, New Orleans, and other points in the South; also the number of daily trains over each line carrying mails to Southern points. Has the railroad to which the extra appropriation of $196,000 is applied put on an extra train or changed its schedule by reason of said appropriation? If so, was such change made specially to facilitate the mails, and without such appropriation be detrimental to the railroad receiving it?"—I beg to state:

First. Between Boston and New York there is but one direct line—the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, which runs through trains almost hourly between Boston and New York, either by way of Springfield, Mass., or Providence, R. I. Between New York and Washington there are two lines—the Pennsylvania and the Baltimore and Ohio (Philadelphia and Reading and Central Railroad of New Jersey). The Pennsylvania has 14 trains each day and the Baltimore and Ohio has 9.

From Washington south we have the Seaboard Air Line, leaving Washington at 4.30 a. m. and 4.40 p. m., arriving at Atlanta at 5.20 a. m. and 2.50 p. m. on the second day, respectively, and New Orleans at 8.10 p. m. on the second day and 7.40 a. m. on the third day, respectively.

The Southern Railway, leaving Washington at 11.15 a. m. and 10.43 p. m., arriving at Atlanta at 5.10 a. m. and 3.55 p. m. on the second day, respectively, and at New Orleans at 8.10 p. m. on the second day and 7.40 a. m. on the third day, respectively. Also the Norfolk and Western Railroad, leaving Washington at 9 p. m. and arriving at New Orleans at 8.30 a. m. on the third day.

Mail from Boston, Philadelphia, and Washington for New Orleans is sent by the Southern Railway because that line insures the quickest delivery. For Atlanta the Seaboard Air Line is used for the 10.50 a. m. dispatch from New York, 1.12 p. m. from Philadelphia, and 4.40 p. m. from Washington, as that connection arrives in Atlanta at 2.50 p. m.; whereas if held for the 10.43 p. m. Southern train from Washington, it would not arrive in Atlanta until 3.55 p. m. On all other connections the Southern makes the quickest time, and therefore carries the mail.

Secondly. The Southern Railway, which is paid the appropriation of $196,000 for extra facilities, has not put on an extra train; nor has it changed its schedule by reason of such appropriation.

The train schedule of this line was practically the same before the appropriation was made as it has been since.

Very respectfully,
JAMES E. WHITE,
General Superintendent.

Hon. A. C. SHUFORD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BUTLER. There is the schedule given by the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service. He states that there has been no increased service given on account of this appropriation, and that if it is discontinued it will not stop any of the service that we have. We have it from the Postmaster-General, from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and from the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service that this is a clear bonus; that we get nothing for it; that it is a clear subsidy—a gift to the railroads in addition to the enormous price we pay for each pound of mail and for the rent of postal cars.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I wish to say but a word during the small portion of the time that remains before the bill is to be voted upon. I think the amendment proposed yesterday by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations should be adopted—to strike out the words "and all sources of revenue and all expenditures of the postal service and rates of postage upon all postal matter." That addition brings up the whole question of second-class matter, and will so add to the work of this joint committee that there is reason to fear the committee will not undertake to do any of the business committed to it.

These words were added by the Committee on Appropriations to the amendment proposed by the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. That amendment as reported by me from the committee on the 23d day of March, 1898, only proposed to investigate the question whether or not excessive prices are paid to the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails and as compensation for postal-car service. The proposition of the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was to make that kind of an investigation and stop there. The committee believed that that would be enough to occupy an industrious committee from the time of the adjournment of the present session of Congress until the first Monday in December next.

We find in the appropriation bill $30,500,000 appropriated for transporting the mails on the cars. We also find an appropriation of $4,000,000 for postal-car service, which, as has been shown by the Senator from North Carolina, is an additional payment to the railroad companies besides the pound rate for transporting every pound of mail in the very same postal cars. The Senator from North Carolina has shown that the United States in this appropriation of $4,000,000 pays every year the full value of every one of these postal cars, which may last ten or twenty years.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment? I wish merely to say that I want just a minute of the time. I think there are five minutes left.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not spoken yet, and I will not make any contract with the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. All right.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to interrupt him, I understand him to say that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads recommended exactly the same provision that is embodied in my amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads thought that to investigate this $34,500,000 worth of expenditures, with all the charges which have been made that the expenditures are exorbitant, would be work enough for the committee. Now the amendment comes back to the Appropriations Committee loaded down with the additional requirement that the committee shall investigate all sources of revenue and all expenditures of the postal-car service and rates of postage upon all postal matter. Mr. President, that is a general instruction to investigate everything connected with the Post-Office Department. It was not the purpose of the Post-Office Committee to propose or to insist that the special joint committee should undertake this large amount of work.

Mr. President, far be it from me to make any imputation upon the Committee on Appropriations by suggesting that they had a hope or an expectation that if the committee was thus loaded down with this additional work they would be appalled at the magnitude of the task set them by Congress and would not undertake to do any of the work they were told to do, but the danger is that that will be exactly the result. Therefore, although I shall vote for two committees, in accordance with the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, if the motion for two committees is voted down, I shall vote, and I ask Senators to vote, to strike out this additional work which is to be imposed upon the commission by the Committee on Appropriations and vote for an investigation by a joint committee exactly as it was recommended by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, I have not been on either of these great committees, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and the Committee on Appropriations, that have charge of the subjects relating to Post-Office matters; but I can not fail to see the necessity of reform in the construction of the Post-Office appropriation bills. I am very glad that these committees have at last entered upon this subject of reform. I appreciate the industry displayed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], who is a member of the former committee, in bringing these matters before the Senate. I regret the lack of courtesy in his manner of presentation, but the information and the facts he has brought to the attention of the Senate are valuable.

This discussion has caused me to look into this appropriation bill more carefully than I have usually done, and I am appalled at the manner in which the public money has been appropriated. There is no precedent for it in any of the other great appropriation bills.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to withdraw anything that was discourteous to the Senator from Florida, if he so construed the meaning of what I said.

Mr. PASCO. Of course I accept this withdrawal, Mr. President. I wish to read a few items to show the great power that is given to the Postmaster-General under the present system of making appropriations for his Department.

For compensation to postmasters, $16,750,000.

I do not know what this appropriation is based upon, but here the entire expenditure of that vast sum is placed in the hands of the Postmaster-General without any other restriction or limitation than that it is to be used for compensation to postmasters.

Mr. ALLISON. It is based upon absolute statutes and must be expended according to such statutes.

Mr. PASCO. There is no statement as to what salaries or allowances the different postmasters are to receive, nor how the compensation of these officers is to be adjusted. It is not appropriated as money is in the bills making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service which fixes the salaries for officers all over the world, but that sum is placed at the absolute disposition of the Postmaster-General.

For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $11,900,000.
Free-delivery service, etc., $13,085,400.

And so further on:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, etc., $30,500,000.
For railway post-office car service, $4,000,000.

In those five or six appropriations, containing less than perhaps ten lines in all, more than $75,000,000 is placed at the absolute disposition of the Postmaster-General, limited only by general language as to the purposes for which these sums are to be expended.

I am glad that the committees who have charge of this great subject are at last aroused to the importance of some change. I am glad that this proposition comes here to have an investigation by a joint committee of the two Houses as to whether these amounts are excessive or not. I wish that such an investigation had been entered upon before. My votes upon the items in the present bill have been and will be based upon the recommendation of the committees. I generally follow them, and I approve the proposition to enter upon an examination. I want it to be as thorough and as full and as complete as possible.

I do not like the idea suggested by the Senator from North Carolina that the investigation should be restricted in any way, but if it can be divided up so that the work may be done more thoroughly by several committees, I shall be satisfied, provided the work is well done. But I have not been willing, Mr. President, to vote against the items of appropriation in this bill until this examination has been made, until these committees have performed the proposed work. When they come in with their reports and show the different lines upon which we can enter upon this reform, my disposition will be to cooperate with the committee in carrying out any propositions to reduce the expenditures of the Department that they may report back to the Senate. We shall then, I hope, have information before us and an intelligent and fair report, upon which proper action can be based.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I heard with some surprise the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] announce that he proposed to vote for a limitation of the scope of this investigation. I have in my hand House joint resolution No. 190. It was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in the House of Representatives. It provides for a joint commission of four Senators and four Members of the House, and provides further that—

> Said commission shall make full inquiry and examination into the postal service, including rates and methods of transportation, rental of cars, subsidies, pneumatic-tube systems, rural free delivery, and so forth—

In the which "and so forth" there is much learning—> and also the classifications of mail matter and charges thereon, especially second-class matter, and the rulings and practices that have obtained thereunder, and such other features of the postal service as said commission may, in the course of its duties, deem proper to subject to their inquiry and examination.

That joint resolution was reported unanimously and favorably in the House of Representatives. It passed the House unanimously. It came to the Senate and went to the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It was reported unanimously from that committee by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. Now, that is the absolute and deliberate thought of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the House, of the House itself, and of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate. The Senator from New Hampshire is suddenly of a dissenting opinion.

These questions of the sufficiency of the pay for postal cars, subsidies, etc., are the items which will pass into the possession of this committee for examination and report by the 1st day of January, 1899, which date the House unanimously and the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate unanimously seemed to think was sufficiently distant to enable them to cover the entire ground.

I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask to have the amendment read which the Senator from Pennsylvania moves to lay on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, at which time, by unanimous consent, the vote must be taken on amendments and on the bill itself. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] moves to lay the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] on the table. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 5, line 14, after the word "service," it is proposed to strike out the words:

> And all sources of revenue and all expenditures of the postal service and rates of postage upon all postal matter.

Mr. BUTLER. I modify my amendment and offer a substitute for the whole section, which will provide for two committees, one committee to investigate one branch of the subject and another the other branch.

Mr. QUAY. That is, one amendment is withdrawn and another substituted.

Mr. BUTLER. This is a substitute for the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. QUAY. Then there is only one vote to be taken.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from North Carolina withdraws the amendment he moved yesterday, I shall renew it after the vote has been taken on his substitute for section 5.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed substitute will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 5, on page 14, and insert as a new section in lieu thereof the following:

> SEC. 5. That two joint committees, each consisting of two members of the Senate and three members of the House, shall be appointed by the Senate and House, one committee to investigate, during the coming recess of Congress, the question whether or not excessive prices are paid to the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails and as compensation for postal-car service, and the other committee all sources of revenue and all expenditures of the postal service, and rates of postage upon all postal matter, the expenses of said joint committees to be paid, one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House, upon vouchers to be approved by the two chairmen.

Mr. PASCO. Do I understand the amendment to read "two members of the Senate"?

Mr. BUTLER. Two members of the Senate and three members of the House are to be placed on each committee.

Mr. PASCO. I move to amend by substituting "three members of the Senate" instead of "two."

Mr. BUTLER. I accept that amendment.

Mr. PASCO. Then the membership will be the same as is now provided in section 5.

Mr. BUTLER. I will modify the substitute so as to read "three members of the Senate and three members of the House."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the substitute striking out section 5 and inserting the matter just read from the desk.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. I will withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TURNER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEITFELD], and vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired, as heretofore announced, with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. He is absent from the Chamber, and I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will announce that my colleague [Mr. BURROWS], who was called out of the Chamber, is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY].

Mr. GEAR. With the leave of the Senate, I will transfer my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], and I also transfer the pair of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. I vote "nay."

Mr. DANIEL. I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] that I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], and we might transfer our pairs, so that we may both vote.

Mr. DANIEL. Very well; I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 40; as follows:

Mr. CHANDLER. Now I renew the motion made by the Senator from North Carolina yesterday. In section 5, on page 14, lines 14, 15, and 16, I move to strike out the words:

And all sources of revenue and all expenditures of the postal service and rates of postage upon all postal matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. QUAY. I hope that amendment will be voted down.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his point of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want the ruling of the Chair as to whether it is in order to debate any amendment or to debate the bill after the time fixed to take a vote thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that debate is not in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUTLER. I gave notice this morning of an amendment, on page 9, to strike out all after the word "service" in line 2 down to and including the word "service" in line 10; that is, all of the paragraph for railway subsidy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, on page 9, to strike out lines 3 to 10, inclusive.

Mr. ALLEN and Mr. GEAR. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the matter proposed to be stricken out.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the following paragraph, beginning with line 3, on page 9:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from New York and Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $171,238.75: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Mr. QUAY. That is one of the subjects provided for in the investigation ordered by the adoption of section 5.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], or I should vote "nay."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CAFFERY. I understand my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has been transferred to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], which leaves me at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. I stand paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I understand the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If agreeable to him, we can transfer our pairs and both vote.

Mr. MALLORY. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. CULLOM. I vote "nay."

Mr. MALLORY. I vote "nay."

Mr. DANIEL. I have a general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH].

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest to the Senator from Virginia that we make the same transfer of pairs we made a few moments ago.

Mr. DANIEL. I was going to state that I should like to vote on this matter, if I am free to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] stand paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], with whom I am paired, and that will enable the Senator from Virginia and myself to vote.

Mr. DANIEL. That is satisfactory, and I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN. I understand the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. I am paired with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE]. I suggest that we transfer our pairs, so that we may both vote.

So the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4142) to provide a life-saving station on the westerly side of the harbor of Gloucester, Mass.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6161) for the protection of fish in the District of Columbia, for the maintenance of a permanent spawning ground in the Potomac River in said District, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1586) to provide for the sale of public lands in Missouri.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 214) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to rent lighting apparatus for Government building at Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

TRANS-MISSISSIPPI AND INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the joint resolution from the House in relation to the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 214) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to rent lighting apparatus for Government building at Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to rent electric wiring and lamps for the lighting of the exterior of the building for the Government exhibit at the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at Omaha, Nebr., if, in his judgment, such course will be less expensive than to wire the building and furnish lamps therefor; the expense thereof to be paid from the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the construction of said building.

Mr. ALLEN. It is a formal matter, and I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I wish to call up the regular order at this hour, being Senate bill 3662.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the unfinished business be first laid before the Senate, being the bill in reference to quarantine matters.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2680) amending "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that that bill may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. KYLE. I now ask that the bill (S. 3662) concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill referred to was made a special order for Monday, May 9, at 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the first special order may be laid before the Senate before the second special order, to which the Senator from South Dakota alludes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire is right. The first special order of the day is the joint resolution (S. R. 83) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HALE. What becomes of the unfinished business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business has been temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. Not to be displaced?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not to be displaced.

Mr. CULLOM. If the constitutional amendment is not coming up, I hope the bill alluded to by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] will be considered.

Mr. KYLE. I understand the joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment will not be taken up this afternoon.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not see any reason why the joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment should take a great deal of time. I ask that it be laid before the Senate. I do not think it will take a great deal of time. It ought not to, as the subject is so well understood.

Mr. KYLE. The bill to which I referred was made the special order for yesterday, and I understood yesterday that when we concluded the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill it would immediately follow the consideration of that bill, and there was unanimous consent to that arrangement.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to put myself in antagonism to the request of the Senator from South Dakota, and shall not do so; but I trust he will permit the bill to pass over until to-morrow. It is a bill of very great importance, but it is very artfully and skillfully drawn; and it is not, in my judgment, going to accomplish what the Senator expects or to accomplish what its friends expect it to accomplish. I have read it with a good deal of care. I have read it in the light of how I think courts will construe it, and I regard it as one of the most dangerous bills that has ever come before Congress. I desire to offer some amendments to it, however, and am not prepared at this time to do so. I do not want to antagonize the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the Senator that no disposition has been made of the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

Mr. KYLE. I ask for the reading of the RECORD of the proceedings of yesterday at the time the bill I have referred to was made a special order for consideration at this time, beginning at the top of the right-hand column on page 5271.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from South Dakota will permit me, I do not doubt the bill was made a special order. I would not dispute anything the RECORD contains, although it contains many things——

Mr. KYLE. I can not hear what the Senator from Nebraska is saying.

Mr. ALLEN. I was only saying that I do not doubt what the RECORD states. I do not doubt, the proposition to amend the Constitution being out of the road, that this is the proper order of business at this time.

I did say a moment ago, and I now repeat it, so that the Senator from South Dakota may hear it, that I have examined this bill quite carefully and desire to examine it still more carefully. I regard it as one of the most dangerous bills that was ever presented to Congress. It is not the work of a bungler; it is the work of a master in the drafting of statutes to conceal purposes. I am satisfied that it needs amendment, and I desire to have some time to propose amendments to it.

Mr. KYLE. The Senator from Nebraska is privileged to offer any amendments to the bill he sees fit when it is under consideration. The bill was drafted at the instance of the labor organizations of the United States. They appeared by its order before the Committee on Education and Labor, and they approved it, together with the amendments. I think there will be no objection to the bill when it is read through and the amendments are stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there unanimous consent given for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, unanimous consent is not given.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the Chair lays before the Senate Senate resolution 83, being a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which is the first special order for the day.

PRESIDENTIAL, VICE-PRESIDENTIAL, AND CONGRESSIONAL TERMS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 83) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. KYLE. I shall wait until some Senator takes the floor on that joint resolution. If no one does so, I shall call up the bill I have indicated.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as part of the Constitution, namely:

The term of office of the President and Vice-President and of the Fifty-sixth Congress shall continue until the last Wednesday of April in the year 1901, at noon; and the last Wednesday of April, at noon, shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th of March as the commencement and termination of the official term of the President, Vice-President, Senators, and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "Wednesday" and inserting "Thursday" in both places where the word "Wednesday" occurs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment, in line 16, after the word "last," by striking out "Wednesday" and inserting "Thursday;" and also, in line 17, after the word "last," by striking out "Wednesday" and inserting "Thursday."

Mr. ALLEN. Let the joint resolution be read as proposed to be amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as part of the Constitution, namely:

The term of office of the President and Vice-President and of the Fifty-sixth Congress shall continue until the last Thursday of April in the year 1901, at noon; and the last Thursday of April, at noon, shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th of March as the commencement and termination of the official term of the President, Vice-President, Senators, and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I joined in the report in favor of this constitutional amendment, and I am in favor of it; but it is such a radical change that I think it needs some explanation; that is, the people of the United States will want to know why the term of office of the President is changed, and they will not be satisfied, in my judgment, with the mere perfunctory passage of this joint resolution. The learned senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is the author of the resolution, and I think a brief statement from him is due to the country.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the reasons for this amendment are two. One, though a very weighty and important reason, is a reason of mere convenience. The other is a reason pertaining to the substance of constitutional government.

I ought to say perhaps in advance that in former Congresses this matter has been considerably discussed and explained, and it has had formerly a good deal of attention from the press of the country, both the newspaper press and the periodical magazines. I believe the joint resolution has passed the Senate twice, certainly it has passed the Senate once, with absolute unanimity, and I have never seen anywhere a serious expression of objection to it.

The first reason, which is the lesser one, but still a grave one, is that the people of this country from the beginning, more and more, as the means of transportation has become cheaper and more easy, desire to witness the inauguration of the President; and the inauguration comes now in a most inclement and oftentimes tempestuous season. The 4th of March has been several times within the memory of all of us one of the worst and stormiest days of the year. The second inauguration of President Grant was a terrible day; and during the whole of that savage storm the boys from West Point stood in the open air exposed. On another occasion, the inauguration of President Harrison, there was a heavy rain, and on still another, a very cold storm. On both of those last occasions, as is well known, many persons all over the country lost their lives from exposure on that day.

The amendment substitutes a delightful season, and ordinarily the warmth of the early summer, mellowed somewhat by the delaying spring, which is found here. The present season has been an unusually bleak and cold one for the end of April and the beginning of May.

But the substance of the amendment and the more important reason for it is this: We have now thirteen great appropriation bills ordinarily, and we have a period of only thirteen weeks from the first Monday in December to the 4th of March, usually the Christmas holidays coming out. So there are less than twelve weeks—less than about sixty-five or sixty-six days, not counting Sundays—for the passage of the thirteen great appropriation bills. It is utterly impossible for the two Houses of Congress to give decent and proper attention to that great legislation, to say nothing of other important legislative matters which come up at that time.

On the other hand, the first session of Congress is prolonged six, seven, or eight months, through the heat of a Washington summer, a heat in the latter part of June probably harder to bear in this low and flat part of the country than almost anywhere, either in the South or in the North. So we have one session when there is no time to do the public business well and another session when it must be done at very great discomfort. Then, if the first session be prolonged into August and September, as is frequently the case, members of both Houses are expected to report their proceedings to the people, they are expected to discuss them before that great tribunal, and to appear before that great judgment seat to give an account of their stewardship. Therefore, later in the session, the members, especially of the other House, when nominating conventions and the preparations for reelections are going on, leave the House, and it is difficult to hold a quorum there.

As every Senator will remember, the time of the assembling of Congress may be fixed by law, so that if we should see fit hereafter to provide that the second session of Congress should begin on the second or third Monday in November, adding two or three weeks at the beginning to the second session, and then should prolong it until the 30th of April, adding nearly two months at the end, we shall have one session of about six months, held at the most convenient and comfortable season of the year for that purpose, and should be enabled undoubtedly to abridge the first session to a corresponding extent. So we should have two sessions of Congress for the ordinary business of the country, beginning about the middle of November, or at any rate the first Monday in December, as now, and lasting within a week or two of six months or more, according as the convenience of Congress should provide.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the unanimous favor with which the Senate has met this proposition when it was adopted before is well warranted. I have never heard but one plausible argument against it—and perhaps it is not worth while to undertake to deal with that now—that is, that the amendment ought to be changed so that the new Congress would meet immediately after the election, and that the popular will, which is expressed in the change of political power in a new election, should find expression in legislation without even the intervention of a single month or a single year.

Some persons with whom I have talked on this subject have held that view, but I think that the time is brief enough. This great political being of ours ought to take a little time to change its mind. It is not always convenient for the gentlemen who are elected to the House of Representatives to leave all their business and repair to the seat of government within a week or two after the result of a doubtful election is declared; and it is well, I think, that the heats, excitements, and passions which sometimes—not so much of late as in former years—prevail in this country in a sharply contested election should have a little time to pass away before the permanent and deliberate will of the people is enacted seriously into the statutes.

That, I believe, is the whole matter, stated briefly. I have made the statement without any premeditation at the request of the honorable Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I always listen with much interest and instruction to everything said by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. In the last Congress, when we had under consideration a proposed amendment to the Constitution for the purpose of changing it in respect to the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people, instead of through the legislatures, I was deeply impressed by the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts. He said that our forefathers, when they framed this Constitution, had deeply, most earnestly, and religiously considered the rights of the States; that the vote direct for a Senator should be sifted through from the people to the legislature, and Senators be there voted for, and that the Constitution should never be changed unless there was some great principle involved in the proposed change.

While it was true, he stated, that the first twelve amendments were adopted immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, yet they were compromise measures proposed by John Hancock, of Massachusetts; Patrick Henry, of Virginia; Alexander Hamilton, and other great statesmen of that day. I therefore waited with some interest to hear from the Senator what great principle was involved in this proposed change of the Constitution. To me, a common layman, it seems that the people may say, "You have voted to extend your term of office for about two months. What reason was there for your voting to extend the term of office to which you had been elected two months longer than the Constitution provided?"

The Senator says there is not sufficient time to pass the appropriation bills, and, therefore, we should continue in session six weeks longer time. Some of our friends may ask us why not meet a month earlier, or six weeks earlier, meeting in October or November, instead of extending the term later on in the spring. And yet, to my mind, there is something stronger involved in this proposition.

I should have said in passing that when the Senator from Massachusetts used the argumentative and eloquent language in the last Congress in relation to the election of Senators by the people, while I was instructed and interested I was not convinced. I believe that when we were a nation of 4,000,000 people and only 13 States the conditions were very different from what they are to-day when we have a population of 75,000,000 and 45 States; and yet the Senate in its wisdom declined to pass the amendment. As I look upon the proposed amendment, there is no principle involved in it.

There is no great reason why we should amend the Constitution, and thereby change our term of office. Indeed, to me it seems almost sacrilege, for there is a halo of sacredness clustering around inauguration day—the 4th of March. The hallowed associations of that day are sacred and dear to every patriotic American. George Washington was inaugurated on the 30th of April, but every other President since that time with but three exceptions has been inaugurated on the 4th day of March, and Sunday coming on those dates, it was on the 5th.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask my friend whether it is not true that on nearly every one of those days the weather was bad?

Mr. PERKINS. We will reach that later on. I think I can convince my friend the Senator from Massachusetts that the Ruler of All, the Providence, exercises a wise jurisdiction over us. In the blessings of Heaven upon us as a nation He has favored the 4th of March quite as often as the last Wednesday in April. I think I can convince him of that fact by the record. On the 4th of March George Washington was inaugurated for his second term as President. A Jackson, a Monroe, a Lincoln, a Jefferson, a Grant have all been inaugurated on the 4th day of March, and to my mind it would seem almost as wicked, if I may use so harsh a term, to change it as to say that the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence shall be on the last Wednesday in July instead of the 4th of July, or that the anniversary of the birth of the Saviour of Mankind should be on the last Thursday in December, instead of the 25th. The associations of that day are enshrined in the hearts of every true American, and I would not see aught done that might mar the patriotism of that day by making an indefinite day.

I asked a friend a few days since why this was proposed. He said to me, perhaps in a jesting manner, that there had been a great many petitions presented to Congress in the past two years proposing to change the preamble of the Constitution by inserting the word "Deity," as if it was necessary for us to place in the Constitution that word to acknowledge the supremacy of that great Architect, the Creator of the world, and who has been the guardian of this great nation. So, out of curiosity, I examined the calendar, and I find by an examination of it, which is verified by the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, that the 4th day of March is especially favored in this respect, the reason being that our Presidential elections always occur in leap year or else in century years, such as 1800, and as inauguration day is the following 4th of March, it is always the next year after leap year when our President takes his oath of office.

Our Constitution, as is well known, was adopted in 1788, so that the first inauguration occurred in 1789, and between 1789 and 1897, which was the last inauguration year, one hundred and eight years, the 4th of March occurred on Sunday in inauguration years only three times, to wit, in 1821, when President Monroe was inaugurated on the 5th of March; in 1849, when General Taylor was inaugurated on the 5th of March, and again in 1877, when Mr. Hayes was inaugurated on the 5th of March. I thought I would continue this calculation for the next century, and I find that the 4th of March in inauguration years will occur on Sunday but three times during the twentieth century, to wit, in 1917, 1945, and 1973. From this statement I am sure that upon religious grounds the most punctilious will not demand a change. It seems as if the calendar of time was on the side of the 4th of March.

Now, my friend the Senator from Massachusetts says that the 4th of March is always stormy, always rainy, and the last Wednesday in April is a delightful day; that it is in the springtime, when the birds are singing and the trees are budding and all nature is rejoicing, and therefore we should inaugurate our President on the last Wednesday in April. My friend the Senator from New Hampshire, however, to-day proposed an amendment making it the last Thursday. I have traced down the last Wednesday in April since we have established the Weather Bureau. I had a little curiosity as to it. While I do not know much about law, I have studied meteorological movements somewhat and have a slight knowledge of astronomy, the action of the heavenly bodies, and I thought I would for my own curiosity examine into this matter. I will call to the mind of every Senator upon this floor that a week ago last Thursday, the day that my friend the Senator from New Hampshire proposes as the day, was the coldest day we have had this winter. The thermometer was down to 34° above zero. That is a sample day, if we change it to Thursday. But I am going to give you the state of the weather since the first inauguration.

I am not going to weary the Senate, but we will have to go before the people; if this amendment is adopted, and give our reasons for it, and I am going to put these tables into the RECORD, so that we can see when Providence smiled upon us and when Providence frowned upon us and when Providence wept for our follies and shortcomings and misgivings. From 1789 to 1897, inclusive, there have been twenty-eight inauguration days. By the assistance of Mr. Spofford, of the Library of Congress, whom I have heard my friend the Senator from Massachusetts eulogize as an authority, as a man who never makes a mistake, and by the assistance of Professor Moore, the Chief of the Weather Bureau, I find that the records show there have been of these inauguration days 17 fair and pleasant days, 9 stormy days, and 2 days for which we have not been able to find any record. Since the establishment of the Weather Bureau—in 1873—a complete daily record has been kept of the meteorological conditions in this city. As I stated before, I had the curiosity to have made comparative tables between the state of the weather on the 4th of March and also on the last Wednesday in April in each year from and including March 4, 1873, to and including the last Wednesday in April, 1898, which was one week ago last Wednesday. This table I will, with permission, have printed in the RECORD:

* * * * * * *

Very truly, yours,

A. R. SPOFFORD.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate.

I will simply give a recapitulation of it, which shows that from 1873 to 1897, inclusive, there were sixteen clear, fair, or partly cloudy days falling on March 4 and seventeen clear, fair, or partly cloudy days falling on the last Wednesday in April in each year.

There were ten rainy, snowy, or threatening days falling on March 4, and nine rainy, snowy, or threatening days falling on the last Wednesday in April in each year.

Snow or sleet fell four times on March 4 in twenty-six years and once on the last Wednesday in April, the latter being more severe than any similar storm on March 4. Rain fell on the 4th of March during six years and on the last Wednesday of April during six years.

The only advantage of April over March in all of these years seems to be that on three of the April days there were high winds and threatening weather in place of light snow or sleet.

Now, there is the record of our Weather Bureau. It is an absolutely correct record. We would gain nothing surely by changing from the 4th of March to the last Wednesday or the last Thursday in April.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from California permit me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course the Senator's figures are correct, so far as the cloudiness or the fair condition of the weather is concerned on those two dates relatively, but has the Senator made inquiry as to the temperature? Is it not very much warmer as a general thing the last of April than it is on the 4th of March?

Mr. PERKINS. I have taken the highest and lowest temperature.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator gives that in his table?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; since the Weather Bureau has been established. I have taken, of course, the records down to 1873, and they give the weather; they state whether it was cold or warm or moderate.

Mr. HOAR. I have not followed all of the Senator's figures, but I understand the result of his inquiry and investigation is that it is an absolute fact that the weather on the last Wednesday of April is usually very much colder and more severe than the 4th of March. That is the substance of it, as I understand.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state to my friend, and I can bring the testimony of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], who is a judge of the weather, that last Thursday one week ago, in April of this year, was the coldest day we have had in 1898. The thermometer registered as low as 32° above zero. It was a most inclement, disagreeable day. We have no way of judging the future but by the past. It was the light of wisdom that has guided us thus far. It is the light of experience that we have to show us that there is no necessity for changing the Constitution to adapt it to the clerk of the weather unless we can so control the elements, while we are making great progress, that we will have assurances that we will have a pleasant day on the last Thursday in April.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest to the Senator from California that we might obviate the difficulty by providing that the inauguration shall take place either at Los Angeles, Cal., or Helena, Mont., where we always have good weather.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my friend whether he has not also discovered on looking at the calendar that the 4th day of March came on Sunday much more frequently than the last Thursday in April?

Mr. PERKINS. My friend the Senator from Massachusetts can place that construction upon it, and really that is the only argument in favor of the amendment. In two hundred years the 4th of March has come upon Sunday six times. With the various religious sects and the changing from one day in the week to another for observance, I do not know but that we will get Sunday around to the last Thursday in April.

In all seriousness, I am speaking from the impression the Senator made upon me in his speech opposing a measure which I advocated from my place in this body, for I earnestly believed it was in the best interest of the Government, in the interest of the people, that our Constitution should be amended and our Senators elected by direct vote of the people instead of through the legislatures. We have had on this floor not one vacancy, but three and four vacancies because the legislatures did not agree. I believe that in this government of the people, by the people, and for the people, the nearer you are in touch with them, the nearer you are in sympathy with them, the nearer right you will be. The very perpetuity and welfare of this great nation depends upon the support of the people. They are the source of all power. I for one am not prepared to stand here in my place and vote for a constitutional amendment that increases the term for which I have been elected by the people. I do not want to serve one day longer than the people have elected me to serve.

I do not believe there have been yet given us reasons sufficient to warrant us in giving a two-thirds vote in Congress to change the inauguration day of our Presidents, to change the term of the Members of the House and Senators, so that instead of expiring on the 4th day of March at noon it shall be the last Thursday in April. If the Senator from Massachusetts will convince me that it is our duty to do it, that something has occurred in the past century, since our Constitution was adopted, to show that it is unwise, imprudent, and wrong for us to continue to have our terms expire on the 4th of March and to inaugurate the President of this great nation on that day, I will then forego the sacred memories that cluster around that day and vote for the last Thursday in April as the day when our term of office shall expire and so as to the term of the President. I submit in all seriousness that there have not yet been sufficient reasons shown here why we should vote for the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question for my information, in order that I may get the benefit of his opinion upon a matter which has suggested itself to my mind. I desire to state in so doing that I was not present in the Judiciary Committee when this bill was considered. Otherwise I should have been under obligations to ask the question then rather than now.

Mr. CHANDLER. This particular amendment came from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon.

Mr. CHANDLER. The other constitutional amendment came from the Senator's committee, the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BACON. In that case I should like not only to have the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts, but the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I think the change, if it can be made, is a very desirable one for many reasons which I will not stop to repeat, because they have already been presented by the senior Senator from Massachusetts. The question in my mind is whether it can be constitutionally done. The Constitution of the United States says the President shall hold his office during the term of four years. Is it competent for Congress, by an act, for any reason——

Mr. HOAR. This is for a constitutional amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is for a constitutional amendment.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is correct about that. I was thinking it was to be by statute. But the Senator still does not meet the trouble in my mind. It would be a constitutional amendment which would affect simply the present term, which would make it expire in April instead of March, as now, but it would not change the general proposition in the Constitution that the term of office shall be four years. The point to which I want to direct the attention of the Senate, and which is not answered by suggesting that this is a constitutional amendment, is that by fixing a day of the week instead of a day of the month you do not have a period of four years between the time of the inauguration of one President and the inauguration of his successor.

In other words, when you fix a day of the week, you will find four years and a day as the term of office or it may be one day less, I forget which, but a varying period. In other words, the last Thursday in April, which might fall on the 24th in one year, would fall on the 25th in the next, or on the 23d. It certainly would not be a fixed period, and as the constitutional amendment would not change the provision of the Constitution which limits the term of office to four years, it seems to me it would be open to that objection.

Mr. HOAR. Has the Senator from Georgia concluded?

Mr. BACON. That is the suggestion. I should like to hear the Senator on it.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that it does change it to that extent. Practically it does not change it at all, because the President of the United States, when the 4th of March comes on Sunday, is never inaugurated until Monday noon, the following day, as is well known. So there is a day clipped off where it comes on Sunday, in fact. I have endeavored to have a calculation made as to how it would work substituting the last Thursday in the month or the last Wednesday for a fixed day of the month. I can not state from memory the calculation, but the substance of it is that what is lost at one end is usually gained at the other, so that there will not be more than one day's variance from a fixed, even term of four times three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours, which is the exact length of our year, except some minutes and seconds also. There will be practically no substantial difference in the limit of the term from what there is now, and this provision, coming after the other saying that the term shall begin and end in the new way, does, of course, modify slightly the exact four-year period provided by the Constitution.

I should like to add one other matter. I will not go back to answer my friend the Senator from California, because I recognize the great wit and facetiousness of his speech, and I would not destroy the charm of its excellent humor by undertaking to put any poor theory of mine in answer to it. But in addition to the statement that the coming on Sunday, whenever it does come, is a great inconvenience, is the fact that when the inauguration comes Saturday or Monday, or even Friday or Thursday, there is great inconvenience to the people from distant parts of the country in being compelled to be absent from their homes on Sunday. The Senator from California makes two statements which he has worked out by the calendar. I do not know whether they are from the records of the Weather Bureau or its prophecies.

Mr. PERKINS. The records.

Mr. HOAR. He says it will be found first that the weather is more tempestuous and disagreeable and cold in this country on the 30th of April, as a general rule, than the 4th of March. That is his first proposition, if I understood him. His other proposition is that the 4th of March does not come on Sunday half so often as the last Thursday in April does, if I understood him correctly.

Mr. PERKINS. That is your construction.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I understood the Senator. I asked him that question, and I understood him to answer it that way.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator says we ought not to extend our term of office by an amendment of the Constitution. We do not do it. We only suggest to the legislatures of the States whether it is wise under the circumstances to do it. If the term is changed, somebody has to do it, and if three-fourths of the legislatures think it best they will do it, but it will not make any great practical difference, because the actual time of legislative work and service will be the same, whether we have one session of nine months and another of three, or whether we have two sessions of six months each. I am sorry my friend from California does not stay to hear me. I was about to say that it will not make the slightest difference to him, because he is very sure to be reelected, as I hope most of the rest of the Senators are, as long as he lives. So his legislative term will last his whole life no matter when the particular constitutional term this time ends or when the next one begins. So it will make no difference to the country and no difference to the very valuable public service of my highly honored friend from California.

My friend says, further, that my desire in the mere matter of the length of the term by a change in the Constitution is to his mind inconsistent with the opposition to a change in the method of electing Senators. That proposition, whether wise or unwise, is the first change ever proposed in the substance of the Constitution. The other changes which were adopted at the time were restraints on the legislative power in the interest of public liberty. They were adding to the Constitution a bill of rights. There is not one of the first twelve amendments to the Constitution of the United States which is not simply the affirmation of a principle which every man would have avowed himself as intending to be bound by, and which in this country is not found enacted in the constitutions of the States, and which was not found in Magna Charta or in the Bill of Rights. This is a mere change of mechanism, like the two amendments of the Constitution which changed the construction of the electoral colleges.

But I did not intend to occupy so much time, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I still think (and I am more convinced of the fact now than I was when I first suggested it to the Senate) that it will be necessary to have the day of the month fixed instead of a day of the week. Since I was upon the floor before I have had occasion to examine some calendars, and the effect of putting in the day of the week is that in every instance except in leap year there is a shortening to the extent of one day instead of the lengthening, as I suggested before. In other words, if you have the inauguration upon the last Thursday in April there will be one day less than four years. The Senator from Massachusetts says that we inaugurate the President now on the 4th of March, whereas the 3d of March is the date. That is true.

Mr. HOAR. No; I did not say so.

Mr. BACON. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. What I said was, that whenever it came on Sunday the Presidential term did not begin until noon on the 5th. That is what I said.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon. I did not understand the Senator. However that may be, that is a very rare occurrence, as the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has shown. But it would be a practical difficulty by which we would be met that whereas the Constitution of the United States says that the President shall serve for four years, if this became the law, and there was an inauguration upon the last Thursday in April, there would be one day lacking of four years, and the outgoing President of the United States would have the constitutional right for the term of one day to exercise the functions and duties of his office after the other President was inaugurated.

While I think this change is a very desirable one, and I quite agree with the Senator in that regard, the joint resolution ought to be amended so as to fix a certain day in the month instead of a day in the week. Then the constitutional provision is complied with, and if it is for any reason to be desired that the day of the week should be inserted instead of the day of the month, the joint resolution ought to be so amended as to make that the term.

Mr. LINDSAY. May I ask the Senator from Georgia whether, if the amendment now under consideration be adopted, the two provisions would not be read together, and the four years made substantially four years, but subject to such variation as would grow out of the last provision?

Mr. BACON. I do not think so, Mr. President, if the Senator has finished his question.

Mr. PASCO. I suggest that while the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] may be correct as to the Presidential office, such a construction may not apply to other offices whose terms now expire with the Presidential term—the Senators, for instance, who are chosen under section 3 of the Constitution for a fixed term of exactly six years.

Mr. BACON. The extension of the present term is definite, and, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, by a constitutional amendment that difficulty would be gotten around in the case of the present term, because so far as the present term is concerned, there being a definite extension, of course there is no difficulty. The amendment provides that—

> The term of office of the President and Vice-President and of the Fifty-Sixth Congress shall continue until the last Wednesday of April in the year 1901, at noon.

That is definite and positive, and there can be no possible constitutional objection to it. But then it goes on and says:

> And the last Wednesday of April, at noon, shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th of March as the commencement and termination of the official term of the President, Vice-President, Senators, and Representatives in Congress.

I do not think that operates to repeal or amend the provision of the Constitution which explicitly says that the term of office of President shall be four years, that the term of office of Senator shall be six years, and that the term of office of Representative shall be two years. Therefore I can see no reason why we should not fix a date and have it definite and certain. Why should we leave in doubt so grave a matter as a constitutional provision, especially one which is to control the great and important question of what shall be the term of office of the President and Senators and Representatives? If it is to be put on a day of the week it ought to be stated definitely, in a way not to leave it in doubt, that the term of office is to that extent changed. But I see no necessity for it when we can so easily put it on a day of the month, and then we shall have no trouble, as in the past we have been free from all trouble in the matter.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, this change is proposed to a great extent on account of the inclemency of the weather on the 4th of March, and we have had——

Mr. HOAR. The most important one is to have a longer term for Congress.

Mr. STEWART. That is one reason, but the one I have stated is another, and it is an important reason. I appreciate the force of it very much. But the Senator from California has shown that in making a change we have not hit upon a good day. It is an unfortunate day that we have selected. It seems to me that the 10th day of May would stand a better chance of being a good day than any of the days mentioned. Take, for example, the weather to-day. Then we would wait until the flowers are out and the trees are in full leaf, and Washington is looking beautiful. If we are going to have this an occasion when the people of the United States can see their capital in its best dress and when it will be more pleasing than at any other time, let us go along a little further in selecting a date, until there is an opportunity given for nature to adorn the city and add to what art is constantly doing. Then you will have a day that will be pleasing and gratifying to the whole American people, and will give them a better idea of the capital of their country.

Mr. LINDSAY. What day does the Senator suggest?

Mr. STEWART. I suggest the 10th day of May. In April the leaves seldom get out. In April the buds start. Washington does not get on her spring dress until about the 10th of May, as is the case now. If we are going to give the people of the United States a pleasant visit to their capital, so as to make a good impression upon them, and if we are going to make a change, the extension of a few days more will make it a most agreeable event.

I concur with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that we had better have a fixed day. I can see less difficulty and more certainty in that method. The matter was considered thoroughly by the framers of the Constitution. They decided it exactly in that way and I do not see that they made any mistake. I do not want to undo their work where it was about right. They probably did not take into account the inclemency of March because they had not experiences in inaugurations on that day as we have had since. If a change is to be made at all, I am in favor of selecting a day when there will be the greatest probability of a pleasant day and one that will give the people of the United States on that occasion a pleasant entertainment. When it is in order to make the motion I shall move to insert the 10th of May.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, this is not a great question of fundamental change in the Constitution of the United States. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] seems to think that we can not make a little change of this sort in our Constitution growing out of the inconveniences surrounding the 4th of March unless we are also willing to make the very great and fundamental change involved in electing United States Senators by direct vote of the people rather than by vote of the State legislatures. That subject has been very fully discussed hitherto in the Senate, and the fact has been developed that we have not in all these years made any change in our form of carrying on the Government. The framework of the Constitution in the methods of getting a government is substantially the same for 75,000,000 people that it was for less than 5,000,000 people. It is one of the wonders of this Constitution of ours that it has sufficed and does suffice for the enormous growth of this great country.

Personally, with as much reluctance as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] manifests, I propose to look with care and caution at anything that can be called a fundamental change in the Constitution. Mr. President, that is not this case. This case raises a mere question of public convenience, whether it is better to have inauguration day a couple of months later than we now have it and whether it is best to have the short session of Congress lengthened from three months to about five months. Now, that is a practical question. If it is to be done, the Senator from California knows very well that it can not be done without lengthening somebody's term. The Senators whose terms expire on the 4th of March, 1901, need not have any hesitancy about their votes, if this convenience should be given to the people, because it would lengthen their own terms. They will not be suspected, I think, of a disposition to legislate for that purpose.

Mr. BACON. I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that the effect will not be simply to lengthen the term of those whose terms expire in 1901, but it will necessarily lengthen the terms of all Senators subsequent thereto; that is, all who have already been elected.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly, all who are elected for six-year terms.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, Mr. President, I do not think any one need to have that horror of reproach the Senator from California seems to think will be made against him if he should vote for this constitutional amendment.

The reasons for making this change are not set out in any written report, because the subject has been under discussion more or less for a great many years. It is not a complicated question. The reasons, one way or the other, are obvious to all persons who give the subject consideration, and they are, as has been briefly stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, to remedy the inconvenience of having inauguration day so early in the spring and the inconvenience of having a long term of Congress one year of nine months or more followed by a short term of Congress limited absolutely to less than three months another year.

The Senator from Georgia says that he thinks what is proposed is desirable if it can be done, but he raises a question as to whether it should be done by fixing a certain day of a given week, or whether it should be done by fixing a day of the month, like the 4th of March. The Senator from Nevada said that he would move to substitute the 10th of May. The 1st of May would be a better day, if a particular day of the month was to be selected. But I say to the Senator from Georgia there are inconveniences both ways and there are conveniences both ways. One inconvenience of the present system is that the 4th of March comes on Sunday every few years.

It is also inconvenient to have inauguration day either Monday or Saturday. When persons come here to attend inauguration on Saturday, that is an inconvenient day, and Monday is an inconvenient day. The committee in fixing on Wednesday and subsequently changing it to the last Thursday of April, because that is the day on which George Washington was first inaugurated in 1789, were influenced by a desire to have the inauguration in the middle of the week, with secular days each side of it, so as to give visitors, visiting organizations, the people of the country who wish to attend the inauguration, an opportunity to come and to go away during the week without encroaching upon Sunday. I submit to the Senator from Georgia that there is the inconvenience of having a fixed day in the month.

On the other hand, the Senator from Georgia has properly shown that there is an inconvenience in naming the last Thursday in April, because it will make the Presidential and the Congressional term unequal. It will vary, but it will never vary more than a week. The variation will be, whenever it happens, from one day to seven days, as the meeting of Congress on the first Monday of December varies from the 1st of the month to the 7th of the month. Now, that is a slight inconvenience. It is not so great in my judgment, it is not so great in the judgment of the committee, as the inconvenience of having inauguration day so often on Sunday, on Saturday, and on Monday, all of which days are practically inconvenient days.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether the committee can state what was the day of the month upon which President Washington was inaugurated? We know that it was the last Thursday in the month, but what was the day of the month?

Mr. CHANDLER. It was the 30th.

Mr. BACON. That, as I understand, is the provision in the original resolution. I very much prefer a return to that. Let it be the anniversary of that great event.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be pardoned by the Senator from New Hampshire——

Mr. CHANDLER. I would rather finish one point, and then let other Senators debate it. The Senator from Georgia had one speech made inside of his, and of course he does not wish to make one inside of mine.

Mr. BACON. No; I do not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have but a few words to say, and those are addressed to his suggestion. The language of the constitutional amendment is sufficient. It, by implication, repeals the provision that the President's term shall be exactly four years and that the Senatorial term shall be exactly six years. It repeals those terms by inference. There is no provision that the members of the House of Representatives shall hold for two years, but only that the members of the House of Representatives shall be elected every second year by the people. The effect of this amendment, if it is adopted, and it will be perfectly operative, is to make the term of the President about four years and the term of Senators about six years, or four years and six years as near as may be. I do not see any difficulty about it. I do not consider it a large question, but I do consider that it is one of considerable practical importance to the people of this country.

I will add, in closing, that I have observed here for a third of a century the inconveniences of the short term of Congress. There is not time in the short session of Congress, between the first Monday in December and the 4th of March, to do business. There is not time, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, to pass the appropriation bills; and the great mass of other legislation which is entitled to consideration, which the people are entitled to have considered, goes by the board at the short session under the inexorable blows which the Committee on Appropriations strike at all other legislation in the interest of getting the appropriation bills through before the 4th of March.

Mr. President, I can not think of any slight change in our Constitution that will be of so much practical benefit to the people of the United States as this amendment, which was drawn by the Senator from Massachusetts, considered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and reported to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to add just one sentence. I should like to have the attention of my honorable friend from Georgia, because when he makes a suggestion about any matter of constitutional law or of legislation, I have found that it is better to listen to it and see what it is. It will always, of course, have very great weight. I want, therefore, to have him consider whether the answer to it is on the whole a fair one.

If you fix a day of the month, once in seven years or thereabouts, never mind how it comes in the calendar, it will come on Sunday. But if it does not come on Sunday, if it comes on Saturday, Monday, Friday, or Tuesday, the people of a very large portion of the country have to be away from home Sunday to attend the inauguration, that depending upon their distance from the national capital. In other words, five years out of seven you must have, if you fix the day of the month, more or less inconvenience by reason of the people who come here having to lose the home Sunday.

In the first place, as I have said, you have got five days in which there will be an inconvenience, whichever day of the month be selected, at least five times out of seven. If you fix it on Wednesday, you will have three days from the following Sunday and two days from the preceding Sunday to come and go and to see the sights here which can not be seen on Inauguration Day. If you fix it Thursday, you have got three days from the preceding Sunday and two days intervening before the following Sunday.

It seems to me that is a good answer to very much of my honorable friend's suggestion. It is true, on the other side, as my friend suggests, that if instead of having a day of the month you have a day of the week fixed, you have got a little inequality of one day, perhaps two in some cases, in the length of what we call the four-years term. On the other hand, what is lost at the end will be made up partly or all in the beginning.

It seems to me that it is practically of very little consequence; and yet I want to repeat that this matter, on which the whole discussion is turned, is not a tenth part in importance of the real, the great reason for doing this thing, to which the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] did not advert at all; and that is, that now we have got one session of nine or ten months, extending into the wretched summer heat, and a short session of only three months, with the Christmas holidays out, if we celebrate them and observe them, in which last session we can not do justice to the thirteen great appropriation bills and can do nothing of other important legislation.

The real and grave argument for this change, compared with which everything else is of the pettiest description, is that you are getting, instead of that wretched arrangement, two solid six-months terms for the public business.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if we could not get a longer session as the second session of a Congress by meeting earlier than December?

Mr. HOAR. The difficulty with that suggestion is, in the first place, you can do that by statute; but if you do that, you have got to have the members of both the House of Representatives and the Senate absent from their State elections, which occur on the second Tuesday, I think, in November, and absent two years out of every four years from the national elections and the national campaigns, where they are expected to give an account of their stewardship. I say that is impossible. The people of the United States will not stand an arrangement which has a session of Congress compelling us and our associates in the House of Representatives to be absent from the campaigns. We are there to give an account of our stewardship. We are supposed to be the best qualified persons to discuss national questions before the tribunal where they are settled. I think, therefore, that we can not expect that change. The Senator will remember that the great national elections, as well as the State elections, come in the year when the present short session begins. We can not, therefore, expect to make any change which will advance the time of the holding of the second session of Congress to a period earlier than the 15th or 20th of November, gaining one or two weeks on the present arrangement.

Mr. PASCO. I fully agree with the Senator from Massachusetts as to the question of convenience and inconvenience, and I fully agree with regard to the lengthening of the session in that way; but he was arguing that we are depending upon this proposed change of the Constitution to get a longer session of Congress, and I merely meant to direct his attention to that point.

Mr. HOAR. That is a very good suggestion, and my answer to it is that the difficulty is about the elections.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I hope the friends of this resolution can agree to the change suggested—that is, that they put it on the day of the month instead of the day of the week. To my mind it is a very serious matter to have the term of office of the President of the United States and Senators and Representatives other than a fixed term. It is the inevitable consequence of having this day upon a day of the week that the length of the term of office varies with each year, and in some instances—I have not made the calculation, but some Senators near by me have—in some instances there will be a variation of nearly two weeks. In other words, the day of the week can fall four or five days later in some years than it does in others, and, on the contrary, it can fall that much earlier, so that it may make ten days.

Mr. HOAR. If it falls on a fixed day of the week, could it ever be less than four days in four years of three hundred and sixty-four days each under any circumstances?

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking of the variation that there may be in that particular term; but I say in some of the terms that may be remote from each other.

Mr. HOAR. I spoke of the entire term. It is impossible that there should be less than three hundred and sixty-four days in a year which begins in a certain week of one month and ends in the same week in the same month of the following year. There are always fifty-two full weeks between that interval, and it can not be otherwise. If that is so, then no one year can be shortened but a day except in leap year; and if all the years were shortened a day, we would lose but four days in a week. But in nine cases out of ten—I have not made the calculation—the day which is cut off at one end of the four years' term will be made up at the other end. So the Senator will find, if he will have some mathematician to calculate it, that there never will be more than a day or two days difference in the length of the Presidential term.

Mr. BACON. The Senator may be correct in his statement that my suggestion was too extreme as to the amount; but certainly it can vary to the extent of six days, and I do not think there ought to be that variation.

Mr. HOAR. It can not.

Mr. BACON. It can vary to the extent of six days. I am not prepared to say it can go farther than that.

Mr. HOAR. But can it possibly vary more than four days?

Mr. BACON. I am not going to discuss the mathematics of it. It is impractible for me to do so. I think I am correct in saying it might vary to the extent of six days; but I should object to it if it were only two or three or four days. I think there ought to be a fixed term for the President and Senators and Representatives, and that it ought not to be less in one term than in another.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia, now that he is dealing with the balancing of inconveniences, whether he does not consider it a great inconvenience to have the end of the term, the 4th of March, come on Sunday?

Mr. BACON. I certainly do; but the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], if I understood him correctly, had made the calculation that in the succeeding century it will only fall three or four times on Sunday.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state that during the past one hundred and eight years the 4th of March has fallen upon Sunday but three times. In the twentieth century it will also fall but three times on Sunday, and I gave the dates, which will appear in the RECORD. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, I want to say, parenthetically speaking——

Mr. CHANDLER. I will suggest to the Senator from California that the Senator from Georgia, and not the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from New Hampshire, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not propose to interfere with the desire of the Senator from New Hampshire to close the debate. I simply desire to say, in answer to the question he has asked me, that where there is inconvenience in the possibility of a day falling upon Sunday it is so extremely seldom in its occurrence that I do not think it is to be weighed in comparison with the impropriety of having an irregular term of office.

Mr. HOAR. If I may ask the Senator, is it not just as bad to have it fall on Monday or on Saturday?

Mr. BACON. I think not.

Mr. HOAR. And nearly as bad to have it fall on Tuesday or Friday. So practically you have got five-sevenths of the time.

Mr. BACON. The suggestion I rose to make to the friends of the resolution was that it ought to be amended so that they may secure its passage. I myself am very frank to say that I can not consent to a change of the Constitution which will give us a variable term for the President and for Congress. I think it ought to be so many years, four, six, and two; and for that reason, in the hope that it might be put into shape where I and such others as may agree with me can vote for it, I made the suggestion. Of course, if Senators do not think it is one which can be weighed, I can not press it upon them.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, if this resolution is to be amended, I hope "the last Thursday in April" will be stricken out and "the 4th day of March" inserted in lieu thereof. If it be decided to amend the Constitution, I hope that will be done, and let us cluster around it the most sacred memories and associations in the history of our country connected with the 4th day of March.

Mr. CHANDLER. How about the Fourth of July?

Mr. PERKINS. That is not the Inauguration Day. You would not have the Fourth of July to celebrate if you had not had a Washington. While it is true he was first inaugurated on Thursday, the 30th of April, his second inauguration was on the 4th of March. A Jefferson, an Adams, a Lincoln, a Grant, all of the Presidents of the United States, have been inaugurated on the 4th of March, and I think to-day it has been shown conclusively by the record that Providence has been as kind to us on the 4th of March as He has been on the last Wednesday or the last Thursday in April.

We have eliminated the question of Sunday, for it has been shown that there were but three Sundays happening on the 4th of March in this century; and yet if there were more, it is the Christian Sabbath, the first day of the week. We have a very large element in this country, however, which keeps the seventh day of the week, the Seventh-Day Adventists. We have another class, the followers of Buddha, who remember Friday; and another class, the followers of Confucius, who remember Wednesday and Thursday. So I do not think we want to amend the Constitution to make it suit the convenience of people as regards the observance of the Sabbath. That is all that has been said in favor of this amendment. We do not want to amend the Constitution to suit the convenience of anyone.

The 4th of March was established by our fathers as Inauguration Day. Let us observe it with all the hallowed and sacred memories and associations which surround it.

As to the short session of Congress, which commences on the first Monday in December, if it be deemed expedient, we can amend the law and meet on the first Monday in November. My observation and experience have taught me that the people have no reason to find fault with us because we do not pass enough legislation. We do too much legislation. There are too many laws passed. We do not digest them sufficiently well. If we did, there would not be so many set aside by the highest judicial tribunal.

So far as the appropriation bills are concerned, we have no river and harbor bill in the short session of Congress, and the other bills are simply appropriation bills which are passed for the support of the Government, and are based on the estimates of the Departments. Since I have had the honor of occupying a seat here we have managed to appropriate all the money, and a little more, that we have collected from the people for a particular fiscal year. I do not think there is any fault to be found in that direction. So we have eliminated every other question. The question is simply, Have we time in the short session to pass the thirteen appropriation bills? For more than a hundred years, since the adoption of the Constitution, we have had no difficulty meeting us in this direction, and I do not believe to-day that we are called upon to vote for an amendment to the Constitution for the purpose of giving us more time to appropriate more money during the short session of Congress.

As to extending our term of office, while my friend from Massachusetts has very facetiously referred to it, the people look with a very jealous eye on that matter. There is a principle involved even in voting for back pay or in voting to increase the length of the term for which we have been elected one single day. It is the people who sent us here; it is the people who are the source of all power, and they always will continue to be in a republican form of government.

I look upon it as a very serious question whether we can conscientiously vote here for an extension of our term without doing violence to the solemn oath we have taken to support the Constitution, which says our term of office shall be for such and such a period.

Therefore, Mr. President, if we are to adopt an amendment to the Constitution, let us amend it by making the date of the inauguration the 4th of March, around which, as I said before, are associated the most sacred and most hallowed memories of any in the history of our country, unless, perhaps, it be the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence; and the two are so closely allied, so closely associated, that I would as soon vote to make the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence to be celebrated on the last Wednesday or the last Thursday in July as to vote to change the date of the inauguration of the President of the United States from the 4th of March to the last Thursday in April.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, if some Senator who believes that there should be a day of the month fixed will move an amendment fixing such a day, the sense of the Senate can be readily taken as between fixing the day of the month and the day of the week. It is a mere balancing of inconveniences, to my mind.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I move to strike out the words "last Wednesday of April in the year 1901," and insert "the 4th day of March."

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no need of that. That is the present system.

Mr. PERKINS. That shows the fallacy of our attempting to amend the Constitution at this time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator from California has demonstrated that he does not want any Congress, because we only come here to appropriate the people's money, that we appropriate too much, that we only legislate, and he says we legislate too much, and therefore, to carry the argument of the Senator from California to its legitimate conclusion, we ought none of us to be here. Inasmuch as a Congress has been provided by the Constitution and by the American people to be the servants of the people, the question of convenience or inconvenience is one for Congress to settle in the first instance and for the legislatures to settle in the second instance when any proposition is made to amend the Constitution of the United States.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] wishes to propose an amendment to fix a day of the month——

Mr. BACON. That was simply a suggestion to the committee. If the committee does not offer the amendment, I certainly shall not.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] gave notice that he would move an amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I think we should have the time extended so that we would be sure of having Washington in its most attractive condition, but it does not make very much difference if a day of the week is adopted and the month should commence on Wednesday. That would put it over not later than the 8th, and it would put it on the second Thursday if the month should commence on Thursday; that is, the inauguration would be about the 8th, and that would be a good season.

I think we want to get away from the 1st of May, when we are apt to have storms, and the city is not always in its best condition. I do not want to have my amendment destroyed on the contest between the day of the week and the day of the month. If the day of the week is to be selected, I would say the second Thursday of May; if the day of the month is to be selected, I would say the 10th day of May.

Mr. HOAR (to Mr. STEWART). Try the day of the week first.

Mr. STEWART. I move, then, if it be in order, that the time be changed to the second Thursday of May.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada what assurance he can give us as to the state of the weather at that time and what it has been in the past century on that day?

Mr. STEWART. I am one of the oldest men now living, and my experience has been that there is good weather at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Chair will state that the Senate has already passed upon the question and adopted a day in the amendment, but the amendment of the Senator from Nevada does not conflict with the amendment as already adopted by the Senate, and therefore it is in order at this time. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment in line 15, after the words "until the," by striking out "last Thursday of April" and inserting "second Thursday of May;" and in line 17, by striking out "last Thursday of April" and inserting "second Thursday of May."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada to the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I was in favor of this proposed amendment to the Constitution in the Committee on Privileges and Elections for two reasons only, and there were but two reasons offered and can be but two reasons offered for it. The first is to rid ourselves of the inclement season of the year. Our inaugurations, as we know, usually come at a very inclement season. I think the inauguration of Mr. Cleveland, which I witnessed, was the most disagreeable day I ever experienced in this city.

The second and possibly the controlling thought was that what we call the short session of Congress should be lengthened by about thirty days. No other substantial reasons can be offered for this proposed change of the Constitution, and I certainly think no reason can be offered in support of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

I enjoy a little of the sentiment expressed by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. I am loath to change from the 4th of March to any other date. I would only be induced to do so because I thought it would be more convenient to the people who desire to attend the inaugural ceremonies and more convenient for those who are required to attend, and because I believe what we term the short session should be lengthened somewhat. But if we are to change to an indefinite date or to place the beginning of the term of the President on the 10th of May, or at some remote date, I should be in favor of voting down the entire proposition.

Mr. President, we must consult the wishes of the people somewhat in this matter. The American people can neither be fooled by sentiment nor by sophistry. They will know of this change. This proposition must go to the different legislatures and meet the approval of two-thirds of them; and when you tell the legislature of a State that the change is made by reason of the desire to avoid the inclement weather and to lengthen the short session of Congress so that the public business may be transacted, they will understand that, and agree to it no doubt, if the change does not lengthen the term more than a month; but when you go beyond that, and go into May or June or some other month, and revolutionize the whole system, you will find the sentiment to which the Senator from California refers coming up and it will defeat the amendment and the very purpose of the amendment.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I would be perfectly willing that the date of inauguration should remain the 4th of March for all time so long as the Government stands; but I can understand there is some propriety in making the change and having the day of inauguration fall a month later, say the 4th of April—and the weather changes very materially between the 4th of March and the 4th of April in this latitude. I realize also the necessity of having four months instead of confining ourselves to three months at the short session of Congress; but if we are to uproot the whole system and throw aside all the traditions and memories of the Government, if we are to sacrifice them to mere caprice, I am opposed to it, and I am satisfied the great body of the American people would be opposed to it.

Naturally the question will arise when this proposition is submitted to the legislatures, Why the necessity for this change? All through our constitutional history we have taken the 4th of March as the day of inauguration. Why do you want to change that date to another date? There is a sacredness attached to the 4th day of March that we can not deny. We may say that it is purely sentimental, and it may be, and it is commendable that the American people are sentimental once in a while. If you say to them we make this change that we may reach a period where there is better weather, where the people from all over this country can come here without being inconvenienced, their good sense will recognize that and recognize the necessity of it. If you say to them in addition to that that this country is growing so great that it takes more than three months at the second session of Congress to transact the public business properly, they will understand that, and they will accept an amendment making it the 4th of April instead of the 4th of March.

But, Mr. President, if you go beyond that, I am satisfied the people will rise and denounce the proposed amendment, and it will be defeated by the legislatures and we will not accomplish what we desire to accomplish by it. I agree entirely with what a Senator said to me a moment ago, that we have ample time to legislate if we only would; but the difficulty is that when we come here, instead of starting at our work as though we intended to accomplish it, we begin skirmishing for position in party politics. Every needed law, every appropriation bill, everything necessary to be done by the Congress of the United States for the benefit of the people of this country can be done in five months for the whole two years if we would sit down here and go to work.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] suggests to me that we practically do nothing in December. We come here on the first Monday in December, as the Constitution requires; we organize; we discuss a little politics, introduce a few resolutions and a few bills; rarely have any committee meetings; rarely go to work; and instead of paying attention to the public business, as we ought to do, we are beginning to think about adjourning and going home for Christmas and New Years, and some of us have to travel halfway across the continent.

It is the most delightful thing in the world for a man to be with his family at Christmas time and on New Years, but we ought not to do that at the sacrifice of a trust reposed in us. When we come here under our oath under the Constitution to legislate for the people of this country, although it may be inconvenient for us, let us discharge our duty as speedily and as well as possible and adjourn and go home. Here is a Congress which began on the first Monday of last December, and we are now going well into the sixth month since this session of Congress began, the first regular session of the Fifty-fifth Congress. What have we done? Who can point to a measure of any importance that has been passed by this Congress that could not have been passed within two days if we had undertaken to do it? Can any man point to any great national measure outside of the measures which have come up within the last few weeks in connection with the war? Not one. We have simply wasted our time. We have wasted the time of the people; and when I speak of that, I mean what I say. We have wasted the time of the people and our own time to no advantage to either.

I do not wonder sometimes that people become disgusted with Congress and everything and everybody connected with it. Of all the organizations on this continent that is proverbially a destroyer of valuable time the Congress of the United States stands first. Suppose, Mr. President, any private individual or private corporation should undertake to conduct his or its business as the Congress of the United States conducts the business of the United States; what would be the result? Absolute bankruptcy in less than twenty-four months. And yet we come here and we talk Republicanism and we talk Populism and we talk Democracy, undertaking to fortify our parties before the people, while we neglect the people's business and increase their taxation.

We are to have shortly, I suppose, additional burdens for the people to bear, and I would at that time like to hear the sentiments of the distinguished Senator from California. I shall listen for them. We are to have, if Senatorial rumor is to be believed, a proposition before us pretty soon to increase the burdens of the people. To the one thousand millions of interest-bearing obligations that have come down to us as an inheritance from the late civil strife we are to have six hundred millions more—a perpetual national debt to rest as a burden upon the people of this country.

Mr. President, I do hope it may not come. I have no hesitancy in announcing in advance the position I shall take upon that proposition if it reaches us, as I think it will. I would hold myself as an enemy of my country, of the generations of American children to come, if I ever cast my vote for a proposition of that kind when there is a possibility of raising ready money to meet the expenses of the war and of the Government outside of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nevada to the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I ask leave to modify it. After consultation with several Senators I suggest the first Thursday in May.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, would an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Nevada be in order? I move as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Nevada the 4th day of May.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska is not in order as in Committee of the Whole, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having already adopted the amendment inserting the word "Thursday."

Mr. ALLEN. I was not aware of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 15, after the word "the," where it occurs the second time, strike out "last Thursday of April" and insert "first Thursday of May;" and in line 17 strike out "last Thursday of April" and insert "first Thursday of May."

Mr. BACON. Do I understand the Chair to rule that it is in order to offer an amendment such as that just read, and that it is not in order to offer an amendment fixing a day of the month instead of a day of the week?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ruled that the amendment was not in order, because as in Committee of the Whole the word "Thursday" was inserted, and it can not be changed unless it is reconsidered. But in the Senate such an amendment will be in order.

Mr. BACON. I do not desire the Chair to understand me as taking issue, but I did not understand the ruling of the Chair, and I desired to hear it.

Mr. HOAR. This is a very important matter, of course, and no Senator, however much he favors the amendment, would desire to have it adopted without a full understanding by every Senator and without opportunity for every Senator to improve it, if he thinks he can. I hope there will be unanimous consent that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia shall be deemed in order. I ask that.

Mr. BACON. I did not offer the amendment. It was offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; then let it apply to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. If I can have unanimous consent, I move to insert the 4th day of May, making it two months later than the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada withdraw his amendment?

Mr. STEWART. I will accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, and let it be voted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "the" where it occurs the second time in line 15 strike out "last Thursday of April" and insert "4th day of May;" and, in line 17, strike out "last Thursday of April" and insert "4th day of May."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that by unanimous consent the adoption of the word "Thursday" in the amendment has been reconsidered by the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to say that I should not have asked for a vote on the amendment if I did not expect it to be open to further amendment by other Senators.

Mr. BUTLER. There has been a great deal said about sentiment in connection with certain days, especially the 4th day of March. If we change it, why not make it the 30th of April, a day around which there is a good deal of sentiment? There is not much difference as to weather between the 30th of April and the 4th of May. Washington was inaugurated on the 30th of April, and I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that while we are changing from one day to another, why not change it back to the day Washington was inaugurated on—April 30?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I offer an amendment which I ask to have adopted. I will send it to the desk to be read, and then I wish to say a word in reference to it. It is to be inserted at the close of the joint resolution.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to add:

But the compensation of the President, Vice-President, Senators, and Representatives during the Fifty-sixth Congress shall not be greater than if the official term expired on the 4th of March next preceding.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will be adopted.

Mr. BACON. I think that is proper. While we exercise a proper judgment in the public interest, I do not think we ought to legislate in a way to add to the amount of compensation fixed to the term at the time of our election. When we were elected we were elected, speaking of this particular body, the Senate, for six years, with a fixed compensation for each year. And while for a particular reason in the public interest we extend the term, I do not think we ought to add to the amount of compensation to which our election originally entitled us. Therefore I am in hopes that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. STEWART. I hope it will be agreed to unanimously.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me it puts it on rather a smaller or lower plane. I do not understand that we were chosen on any such bargain. I understand that the compensation of the Senators and Representatives is to be fixed by Congress in its own sense of what is right and wrong whenever Congress reaches that subject. It is fixed by statute. We can fix it by statute hereafter.

Mr. BACON. I understand that. There is no doubt, if the Senator will permit me, of our power to say that we shall receive increased compensation if we desire to do so, but that power has been exercised once in the past——

Mr. HOAR. I am not speaking of the power alone. I am speaking of the policy, the public purpose of the framers of the Constitution. The term of very few Senators will be extended.

Mr. BACON. I am one of those whose term would be extended, and I decline to be put in the position of voting myself compensation not originally anticipated.

Mr. HOAR. The Senate is merely making a suggestion. Three-fourths of the legislatures are to determine what the policy will be on that subject, and if the Senator gives, by the desire of the people, six weeks more service to the country, I do not think there will be a very great expression of indignation if he receives the corresponding salary. But that can be fixed by statute. The other salary does not commence. There is going to be an interregnum.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Government will lose nothing.

Mr. HOAR. The Government will lose nothing. This is a very unimportant matter, but I for one certainly shall vote "no" on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I raise the point that if you are going to propose a change of the Constitution it requires two-thirds of the vote of the Senate. The yeas and nays must be called and the Journal must show that two-thirds of the entire Senate voted in favor of it. I saw an amendment pass here the other day when there were not fifteen Senators present, and I take the position that in order to change the Constitution it is essential to call the yeas and nays and let the Journal show on its face that two-thirds of the entire Senate voted in favor of changing the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Georgia that we have not reached that point yet in the progress of the bill. It is within the power of one-fifth of the Senate always to have a call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was about to make the suggestion that the recital as to proposed constitutional amendments on the face of the joint resolution, "two-thirds of each House concurring therein," has been held to make it unnecessary to have a call of the roll. But it is always within the power of Senators to call for the yeas and nays, and to put the fact beyond question. The Senator from Georgia of course can do that if he thinks best.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PASCO. I ask to have the joint resolution read in full.

The joint resolution was read the third time at length, as follows:

That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as part of the Constitution, namely:

The term of office of the President and Vice-President and of the Fifty-sixth Congress shall continue until the 4th day of May, in the year 1901, at noon; and the 4th day of May, at noon, shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th of March as the commencement and termination of the official term of the President, Vice-President, Senators, and Representatives in Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. CLAY. I take the position that it is the duty of the Presiding Officer to order a roll call under our Constitution, that it may appear on the Journal that two-thirds of the entire Senate voted in favor of proposing an amendment to the Constitution. Otherwise fifteen Senators may stand here and propose a change of our Constitution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator read the provision?

Mr. CLAY. I was going to read it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I refer to the one which says two-thirds of the entire Senate.

Mr. CLAY. It is as follows:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof.

It provides that "whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary."

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator if he does not think it means two-thirds of a quorum. We speak of a majority of the Senate. We do not speak of a majority of the entire number. If he stops to reflect, will he not reach the conclusion that it is two-thirds of a quorum?

Mr. CLAY. It does not provide that the yeas and nays shall be called; but I insist that when you propose to amend the Constitution and it says "whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary," it means two-thirds of the Senate and two-thirds of the House, and that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should show that two-thirds of both Houses voted in favor of proposing the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I desire leave to say that I think the point which the Senator makes has been settled otherwise by the uniform practice of the Senate. The Constitution in this case says when two-thirds of both Houses shall think it necessary. It provides in the case of treaties that two-thirds of those present shall favor the treaty. But the mode of determining whether two-thirds vote or not is not prescribed, and it has been the invariable custom, certainly as to treaties, that the Chair announces as a fact, and it is so entered on the Journal, that two-thirds concur. As to the mode of its being shown on the Journal, of course the principle is the same whether we are dealing with a treaty or with a constitutional amendment or the expulsion of a Senator; that is, if the Chair declares and the Journal declares that the necessary two-thirds have voted, it is not necessary to have the individual votes recorded. Of course, there is the difference that the Chair, in the case of a treaty, only needs to declare that two-thirds of those present voted, and in the case of a constitutional amendment he must declare that two-thirds of the Senate voted. Whatever the difference in meaning may be, that is the difference in the constitutional phrase.

But it is very easy to remove the difficulty of the Senator from Georgia in this particular case by asking for the yeas and nays, which some Senator will very likely do.

Mr. MONEY. Will the honorable Senator from Massachusetts permit me to ask him a question? The requirement is that three-fourths of the States shall give their assent. Does the Senator hold that it must be three-fourths of all the States, or three-fourths of those which act upon it?

Mr. HOAR. I suppose three-fourths of the States. I have not looked to see about it, but the President always makes a proclamation.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to state that it takes two-thirds of all the members elected to the Senate, or only two-thirds of a quorum? Does it require two-thirds of all elected to propose a constitutional amendment, or only two-thirds of a quorum?

Mr. HOAR. I suppose if a quorum be present and two-thirds of the quorum vote for the proposition it is lawfully submitted to the States.

Mr. BERRY. That was my own view of it, but a very fine lawyer near me had a different view. That is the reason why I asked the question.

Mr. CLAY. To avoid any further trouble about the matter—I think I am right—I will call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass? on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAFFERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I am not advised as to how he would vote on this question.

Mr. GEAR. I suggest to the Senator to transfer his pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CAFFERY. Taking the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I suggest to the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] to allow the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] to be paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], and we will both vote, if that is agreeable to him.

Mr. MALLORY. It is.

Mr. CULLOM. I vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON].

Mr. DEBOE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY].

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. I will take the liberty to transfer my pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], which has been transferred to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE]. In his absence I withhold my vote. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TURLEY (when Mr. TURPIE's name was called). The senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] was called out of the Chamber. He requested me to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GEAR. I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. By agreement with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], I transfer my pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], who will stand paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], but under the agreement as stated by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] I will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the affirmative). Having taken the liberty to pair the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and the Senator from Rhode Island since then having voted, I desire to withdraw my vote and to stand paired with the Senator from Texas.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 10; as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have a bill here of a good deal of importance to the Surgeon-General's Department. It is only ten lines long, and I can not imagine any objection to it. I ask unanimous consent to consider it now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is unanimous consent given for the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. GORMAN. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is Senate bill 4546.

Mr. KYLE. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me one moment?

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the Senator would not ask me to yield.

Mr. KYLE. Just one moment.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well.

ARBITRATION BETWEEN RAILROAD COMPANIES AND EMPLOYEES.

Mr. KYLE. For the past two days I have endeavored to get unanimous consent—in fact, I had already gotten it—for the consideration of Senate bill 3663. In deference to the wishes of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who wishes to propose certain amendments, I should like to have it go over until to-morrow at 2 o'clock. Therefore I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that we agree to consider the bill at that time.

Mr. GORMAN. What bill is it?

Mr. KYLE. It is a bill concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees—a voluntary arbitration bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What hour does the Senator suggest?

Mr. KYLE. Two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I ask for information of the Senator whether any hearing by Congress was given of this bill and what consideration it had before a committee?

Mr. KYLE. I will state that it had consideration for two successive weeks, and hearings were had several different times.

Mr. SEWELL. In the Senate committee?

Mr. KYLE. In the Senate committee. I will state that the measure I propose to bring before the Senate is the House bill introduced by the Representative from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR, and which passed that body upon last Thursday.

Mr. SEWELL. I want the Senate to know, or I want for my own information to know, whether anyone was ever heard except one side of this question? Was anybody heard except labor organizers? Were the people most nearly affected by it, the people whose business is to be tied up by it, given notice, or were they ever heard?

Mr. KYLE. I will state to the Senator from New Jersey that opportunity was given during several successive weeks for any parties to appear before the committee and make objection or to advocate the interests of the bill, and as far as I know not even one objection was lodged by any railroad company of the United States.

Mr. SEWELL. I do not believe the railroad companies, with all due respect to what the Senator says, unless he will say that he gave notice in writing, over heard of the measure until within the last few days.

Mr. KYLE. I will state that several Senators who were interested in railroad matters have spoken of the bill to me and to other members of the committee and expressed themselves as very well satisfied, inasmuch as it is merely a voluntary measure.

Mr. SEWELL. As I read the bill just now, it is arranged for one side entirely. Practically, the railroad companies will have nothing to say in the matter. I consider it a measure that ought not to pass without full consideration. I think it ought to be recommitted, so that the people who are more nearly interested in it may be heard.

Mr. KYLE. The Senator of course is privileged to offer amendments to the bill when it is before the body if he chooses, and I presume that a number of amendments will be offered. A number have been proposed to me already, and they have been submitted to the railway men of the United States and all of them have been agreed to. The friends of the measure are very liberal in their regard for the wishes of all, and I am sure that any proper amendment will be acceded to upon the part of the Senate.

Mr. SEWELL. As I read the bill, and I have just cursorily glanced over it, it is practically a labor-organization bill. It is not so much a bill in the interest of the labor of the individual as it is in the interest of the organization. It absolutely places the organization away ahead of the laborer and in control of the railroads. It is confined to railway transportation. Why, in getting up a bill of this kind, did you not take in the great bodies where strikes occur, such as mines and manufactures? Why confine it to where there are less strikes, less labor agitation, less trouble, and better pay than on the part of any other bodies of men in the country?

Mr. KYLE. I understand that the labor organizations are most concerned in the proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KYLE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from New Jersey certainly made a very cursory and hasty examination of the bill. It is a bill, of course, which is confined to carriers engaged in interstate commerce, and it is necessarily so confined because that is the extent of the Federal jurisdiction. It is purely a voluntary arbitration bill. When the Senator suggests that it is confined only to arbitration between carriers and labor organizations he is quite mistaken. If he will read the bill with more care he will find that it contains a section which provides for an arbitration agreement entered into by the carriers with individual employees. I think, if the Senator will examine the bill with care, while he may find some features in it which need amendment, he will come to the conclusion that on the whole it is a fair bill to the railway companies and a fair bill to railway employees. I hope the bill may be made a special order. It can be debated thoroughly, and the Senate will be in a better position, if it shall seem necessary, to recommit it after it has been somewhat examined than it is at present.

Mr. SEWELL. I am very glad to learn so much from the Senator from Wisconsin. As I said, I only read the bill for the first time; but it presents itself to my mind just in that way, that it is a labor-organization bill, not a bill in the interest of labor, because it does not allow the laborer to have anything to say except through the organization. I may employ a man and pay him good wages, and he can not do anything. He has to go and get a blacksmith from Kentucky who is at the head of the organization, or some one else, to come here and deal with me. That feature never ought to be contained in the bill. A man ought to deal with his own employees.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, he is mistaken absolutely. The bill applies to arbitrations between carriers and labor organizations and also between carriers and individual employees. If the Senator will permit me further to make a suggestion, it is not so much a question whether it is a labor-organization bill as it is a question whether the bill is right or not. That can all be developed upon a debate, and I think it will not require a very long debate.

Mr. SEWELL. There is nothing in the eloquence, good sense, and judgment of the Senator from Wisconsin that could ever make me believe that anything is right which interferes between me as an employer and the man who is employed by me, if I have to go to a great distance to deal with somebody for an employee who is in my own shop.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a matter to be debated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota makes a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, just one word, if I can have the attention of the Senate a moment. I objected this afternoon to the taking up of this bill. I had read it over twice somewhat critically, but not as fully as I desired to read it over to-night. It struck me, and does yet, that it is the most artful and cunning composition of words against the laboring man and in favor of the transportation company that I have ever witnessed or read. For that reason I objected to it that I might have the advantage of this evening to prepare amendments to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is unanimous consent given that Senate bill 3662 may be made the special order for to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock?

Mr. CARTER. I suggest to the Senator from South Dakota to so modify his request that the unfinished business may at that time be informally laid aside, as it is not desired that this bill shall displace the unfinished business.

Mr. SPOONER. A special order does not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. KYLE. Of course we understand that the unfinished business takes precedence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is made a special order, subject, of course, to the unfinished business.

Mr. SEWELL. I object to the consideration of the bill unless there shall be plenty of time given to offer amendments. It is a peculiar bill and a very hard one to amend.

Mr. HOAR. May I be allowed to make one suggestion to the Senator? The adoption of a special order under our practice is very little more than a notice that the party desires to call up the bill at that time. It does not lay aside the unfinished business, and it may itself be laid aside by a mere vote. If the Senate wants to do something else at that time, somebody can move to lay it aside. If we do not make it a special order, and the Senate wants to attend to this business at that time, somebody can move to take it up. It is a matter of the very slightest importance, except giving notice and having the notice printed on the Calendar that the Senator in charge wants to take it up then. So I hope there will be no trouble about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is unanimous consent given? The Chair hears no objection. The bill is made the special order for to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock.

HOSPITAL STEWARDS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4536) to suspend certain provisions of law relating to hospital stewards in the United States Army, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to suspend during the existing war all provisions of law limiting the number of hospital stewards in service at any one time to 100, and requiring that a person to be appointed a hospital steward shall first demonstrate his fitness therefor by actual service of not less than twelve months as acting hospital steward, and that limit the amount to be expended for the pay of civil employees in the Medical Department of the Army in one year to $40,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENLISTMENT OF CUBANS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is a Senate bill which comes over from the House amended and now lies upon the table. I ask that it be taken up, as I desire to make a motion in reference to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4518) to provide assistance to the inhabitants of Cuba, and arms, munitions, and military stores to the insurgent forces, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 11, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 10, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report which was unfinished yesterday.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from California will suspend for a moment, the report of the Committee on Enrolled Bills will be presented.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. Res. 260. Joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore George Dewey, United States Navy, and to the officers and men of the squadron under his command; and

H. R. 10251. An act fixing the number of rear-admirals in the United States Navy.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 4476. An act granting a pension to Sarah M. Bennett—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3693. An act granting an increase of pension to Leah L. Price—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4491. An act granting an increase of pension to Susan D. Yates—to the Committee on Pensions.

NAVAL BATTALION IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California calls up the matter pending at the time of the adjournment of the House yesterday, which was the motion to lay on the table a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the report of the conferees on the naval-battalion bill was passed.

The question was taken; and the motion of Mr. HILBORN to lay the motion on the table was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF THE METROPOLITAN RAILROAD.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of House bill 10222, to authorize the extension of the Metropolitan Railroad.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, authorized and required to extend, by double tracks, the lines of its underground railroad from its present terminus at the intersection of Eighteenth street and Columbia road east to Erie street, thence along Erie street to Seventeenth street NW., thence north along Seventeenth street to Park street.

SEC. 2. That the said company shall have the right to acquire and obtain the right of way over and through the land on which the aforesaid line and route is to be located and extended; and in the event that the said company shall not be able to come to an agreement with the owners of any land through which said line and route may be located, proceedings for the condemnation for the use of the company of so much land as may be required for the right of way (not exceeding 30 feet in width) may be instituted in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, under and in accordance with the provisions of sections 257 to 267, both inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia; and in making their decision and in determining the value of the land to be condemned under the provisions of said act the jury shall take into consideration and make due allowance and deductions for and in respect of all benefits that the jury shall find said railroad may be to each owner of any lot or lots, a part of which is condemned, by enhancing the value of the remainder of said lot or lots: Provided, That in the event said Erie street or Seventeenth street shall be hereafter opened to the public along the right of way above mentioned, then the said company shall convey to the District of Columbia, free of cost, for the use of the public, the right of way over the said 30 feet, subject, however, to the right of said company to use and occupy the same for the operation and maintenance of its said railroad. The said Commissioners are authorized and empowered to locate the lines of the railroad of said company within the area so to be acquired as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That the extensions herein provided for shall be completed and put in operation within one year from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill in line 5 by adding, after the word "underground," the word "electric;" so as to read "underground electric railroad."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, after the word "underground," add the word "electric;" so that it will read "the line of its underground electric railroad."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. The bill authorizes the jury to take into consideration the advanced or increased value of the property. Why not also authorize the jury to take into consideration the damage done to the property? Why not let that work both ways?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. It does.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did not hear it so read. Then there is one other question I want to ask. Is this condemnation price to be paid before they enter upon the land, or has the road the right to take possession of the property and let the owner take his chances for payment afterwards?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Whatever the usual custom is in condemnation proceedings.

Mr. BABCOCK. The condemnation proceedings are, under the present statute in the District, the provisions of section 257 to 267, inclusive, under which all condemnation proceedings are instituted.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Has the company the right to go on and take possession of the land at once?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, no.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest that the bill be amended so that the jury may also consider the damage to the lot, or the house, for instance.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is the law under which condemnation is made.

The SPEAKER. Will the House please be in order. The Chair does not know whether the dialogue is continuing or has been suspended.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I will simply state for the information of my friend, as well as other members on the floor of the House, that the matter to which he refers is amply provided for in the present law. Chapter 11, relating to highways, roads, and bridges, section 261, of the Revised Statutes, provides that—

In making their decision the jury shall take into consideration the benefit such road may be to each owner by enhancing the value of his land or otherwise, and shall give their verdict accordingly.

Now, the act of Congress awarding the charter of the Maryland and Washington Railway Company, approved March 2, 1895, 28 Statutes, 713, contains this provision:

That when the use of a part of any parcel or tract of land shall be condemned in such proceedings, the commissioners in assessing the damages therefor shall take into consideration the benefit of the purpose for which it is taken may be to the owner or owners of such tract or parcel by enhancing the value of the remainder of the same, and shall make their award accordingly.

That is according to the damage, taking into consideration the benefits which may accrue to the property through which the road passes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In other words, this company is to be liable for damages, but in some cases the damages may be offset by the benefits.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Yes; whatever benefits may accrue to the property holders are to be taken into consideration.

Mr. SIMPSON. If the benefits should be greater than the damages, may not the holder of the land actually owe the railroad company money?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. There would be no damages assessed in that case.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman is satisfied that under this bill private property can not be taken until the damages have been assessed?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Oh, yes; I do not think there is any doubt about that. I ask for a vote.

The question being taken, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PROTECTION OF FISH IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for the present consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6161) for the protection of fish in the District of Columbia, for the maintenance of a permanent spawning ground in the Potomac River in said District, and for other purposes.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Page 2, line 5, strike out "or striped bass (otherwise known as rockfish)."
Page 2, line 6, strike out "fifteenth" and insert "first."
Page 2, line 10, strike out "which shall not include the taking of fish" and insert "nor catch nor kill any of the aforesaid species."
Page 2, line 11, after "lines" insert ", having a succession of hooks or devices."

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. This concludes the business of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

GOVERNMENT BUILDING, OMAHA EXPOSITION.

Mr. MERCER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 214) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to rent lighting apparatus for Government building at Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to rent electric wiring and lamps for the lighting of the exterior of the building for the Government exhibit at the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at Omaha, Nebr., if, in his judgment, such course will be less expensive than to wire the building and furnish lamps therefor; the expense thereof to be paid from the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the construction of said building.

Mr. DOCKERY. As I understand, this joint resolution does not propose to increase the limit of expense.

Mr. MERCER. It does not. The passage of the joint resolution is asked for by the Treasury Department and will save about $2,000.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REVISION OF PATENT LAWS, ETC.

Mr. HICKS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 9815) appointing commissioners to revise the statutes relating to patents, trade and other marks, and trade and commercial names.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint three commissioners, whose duty it shall be to revise and amend the laws of the United States concerning patents, trade and other marks, and trade or commercial names, which shall be in force at the time such commission shall make its final report, so far as the same relates to matters contained in or affected by the convention for the protection of industrial property concluded at Paris March 20, 1883, the agreements under said convention concluded at Madrid April 14, 1891, and the protocols adopted by the conference held under such convention at Brussels, 1897, and the treaties of the United States, and the laws of other nations relating to patents, trade and other marks, and trade or commercial names.

That they shall report to Congress as soon as possible.

That the report shall be so made as to indicate any proposed change in the substance of existing law, and shall be accompanied by notes which shall briefly and clearly state the reasons for any proposed change. It shall also be accompanied by references to such treaties and foreign laws relating to patents, trade and other marks, and trade or commercial names, as, in the opinion of the commissioners, may affect the citizens of the United States.

That the sum of $250, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated to pay the necessary expenses of the commissioners in making their report, which sum shall be immediately available.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Is the expense of this commission not to exceed the sum of $250?

Mr. HICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Can the work be done for that amount?

Mr. HICKS. The expense is not to exceed the sum named in the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Can commissioners do this work for that amount?

Mr. HICKS. Yes, sir. Our commissioners abroad have served without compensation, and I have agreed with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] that I will move an amendment to this bill to insert after the word "commissioners," in line 4, page 1, the words, "to serve without compensation." If the House will agree to consider the bill, I will move that amendment.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HICKS. I now move to amend by inserting after the word "commissioners," in line 4, page 1, the words, "to serve without compensation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HICKS] did not answer the question of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], which was whether all expenses would be covered by $250. Is the gentleman willing to offer an amendment to add the words "and no more?"

Mr. HICKS. The expenses are to be covered entirely by the sum of $250, which is for typewriting and other writing that is to be done in connection with the work of this commission. The commission is to report to Congress a revision of the laws on this subject, so as to make our patent and trade-mark laws correspond with our treaties with foreign nations. That is the purpose of the commission.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why not add at the close of the bill after the words "which sum shall be immediately available" the words "and in full for all expenses?"

Mr. HICKS. I am willing that the gentleman from Georgia should offer that amendment. I will assent to it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I offer that amendment, to come in at the close of the last paragraph.

Mr. STEELE. As I understand, these commissioners do their work for nothing, and it certainly would be unjust to ask that they pay their own expenses for typewriting, etc. If this appropriation is not enough, why not give more?

Mr. HICKS. It is all that the commissioners ask and all that the gentlemen who are back of this movement desire.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to avail myself of this opportunity to submit one single observation, by way of vindication of my own judgment, in reference to the question of revising our statutes.

I offered a bill in the last Congress providing for a general revision of the statutes of the United States. It will be remembered that there has been no general revision since the revision under the act of 1873 as amended, whereas the usual practice in the States of the Union is to revise their statutes every ten years. Believing that the United States statutes should have an immediate revision, I introduced the bill, which was favorably reported, but for reasons the Speaker is entirely familiar with that bill did not pass.

Subsequently an amendment was offered to the sundry civil bill in the Senate creating a commission to codify and revise the criminal and penal laws of the United States. That commission is now in full blast, and, with a corps of clerks, I suppose, is busily engaged in the work of accomplishing this revision.

Now comes another commission—and I agreed not to object to the consideration of this bill—to revise the patent laws of the United States.

I hope at some time, along the lines of these various revisions, we shall have one commission to revise all of the laws of the United States. In my judgment it is an important work, and one that should be accomplished without delay.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no misunderstanding in reference to the pending bill, this relates, I will state to the House, to a revision of the laws covering patents and trade-mark regulations which come within the scope of our agreement with foreign nations.

I ask a vote upon the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HICKS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a bill that is now on the Speaker's table, relating to the sale of public lands in Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1586) to provide for the sale of public lands in the State of Missouri.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments to the House amendments to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

In House amendment No. 1 strike out all after the word "not" in line 11 down to and including the word "not" in line 15.

In line 1 change section 2 to section 1.

Change section 1 (of Senate bill) to section 2.

Amend the title of the bill to correspond with the amendments recommended.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill, if I may be permitted a few moments, was called up by unanimous consent a few days ago on motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]. In the House we added an additional section to the bill. The bill as originally proposed dealt only with the public lands in Missouri, but we have provided a new section making it a general bill, covering the same general subject with reference to all of the lands of the United States, a similar bill being now on the Union Calendar, and abolishing the distinction heretofore existing in the law between what are known as "offered" and "unoffered" lands all through the United States.

That bill was prepared by the present Commissioner of the General Land Office, Mr. Hermann, and was introduced here at his request in order to simplify land matters in the issuance of patents from his office.

Now, we asked the Senate for a conference on the House amendments; but the Senate accepted all of our amendments, with the addition of a few slight amendments of their own as to the verbiage of the second section, and transferring the sections, in order to make the general section first and the local, or Missouri section, the second one, which was conversely arranged by the House, as will be remembered.

If we agree to the Senate amendments, the action of the House and of Congress will be entirely in harmony with the proposition submitted by the Department.

Mr. BLAND. I think the bill is entirely satisfactory. I know it has been so stated by those gentlemen with whom I have conferred on the subject.

Mr. LACEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the previous question on the adoption of the amendments.

The previous question was ordered; under the operation of which the Senate amendments were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ELECTION OF SENATORS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution No. 5, which is on the House Calendar, be taken up to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal and considered until a vote thereon is reached, until, say, 4 o'clock, when a vote shall be taken.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution, providing for the election of Senators of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendments be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall become and be a part of the Constitution, namely: In lieu of the first and second paragraphs of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States of America, the following shall be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"SECTION 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. These Senators shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States unless the people of any State, either through their legislature or by the constitution of the State, shall provide for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people; then, in such case, United States Senators shall be elected in such State at large by direct vote of the people; a plurality shall elect, and the electors shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

"When vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, in the representation of any State in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the next general election, in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State."

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why not take this joint resolution up and pass it now?

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, the reason why I do not ask for its consideration now is because a large number of members have expressed a desire to address the House upon this subject, and many of them are not present at this time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There are enough here to talk out this day.

Mr. CORLISS. This joint resolution provides for an amendment to the Constitution, relating to the election of Senators by direct vote of the people at the option of the State. While the measure in some form has been before the House heretofore, it has never been presented in this form, so as to leave it optional with each State to determine whether its Senators shall be elected by the direct vote of the people or not. It is a measure that a number of members are interested in, and so I make this request.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest to the gentleman that we take this matter up now and consume the day. You will find there are members enough here to talk out the rest of the day.

Mr. CORLISS. I should prefer to take it up to-morrow.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I object to the consideration.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

LIFE-SAVING STATION, GLOUCESTER, MASS.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4142) to provide a life-saving station on the westerly side of the harbor of Gloucester, Mass.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a life-saving station on the westerly side of the harbor of Gloucester, Mass., at such point as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been unanimously reported by the House Committee on Interstate Commerce, and unless some gentleman desires an explanation, I ask for a vote.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is a general authorization, that is all?

Mr. MOODY. It is a general authorization. The bill carries no appropriation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What committee reported this bill?

Mr. MOODY. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I have the report in my hand. It is unanimous and very brief. The establishment of a life-saving station at the point named in this bill is strongly urged by the Superintendent of that Service. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] cares to hear me, I could convince him in one moment that it is very urgently needed for the protection of the commerce of the country.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Was not that matter before the Committee on Appropriations at one time?

Mr. MOODY. It has never been before the Committee on Appropriations while I have been a member of that committee, and I do not think it has ever been before the Committee on Appropriations at all. This is a place where, in one night, on the 1st of February, 1898, twenty-five vessels were wrecked, with a loss of thirty lives.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. For the want of a life-saving station?

Mr. MOODY. Just a life-saving station.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOODY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. MOODY, the corresponding House bill (H. R. 8881) was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, as there does not seem to be any business, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CORLISS. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 11, 1898.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. CARTER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

Mr. CARTER. I observe that in the orders of unfinished business the bill (S. 2680) amending "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893, appears first in order. After conference with Senators having that bill in charge, I am advised that there is no disposition to press its consideration at present. I therefore ask that the bill (S. 4545) to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses be substituted on the Calendar as the unfinished business first in order, in lieu of Senate bill 2680.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see any members of the Committee on the Census upon this side. Was there any understanding between the members?

Mr. CARTER. I consulted the Senator's colleague and——

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator to let the request lie over for just a few minutes until some upon this side who are on the committee come in.

Mr. CARTER. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that I consulted his colleague [Mr. VEST] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] having the bill in charge.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not speaking in regard to the quarantine bill, but the census bill alone. I do not see any of our members who are on that committee present. That is the only reason.

Mr. CARTER. I can say to the Senator from Missouri that it is the unanimous desire of the Committee on the Census that this shall be done. The report has been completed and the bill reported unanimously, and it is ready now for consideration. It is the desire of the committee that it shall be considered at such time as the Senate may be able to proceed with it.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the chairman of the Committee on the Census will allow me, I will say that I think the bill has been unduly delayed and that it ought to be pressed as soon as possible with the utmost vigor and made a law. Otherwise preparation for the work of taking the next census, amid the clash of arms, will be forgotten.

Mr. CARTER. I think the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire is timely and pertinent, and I believe it will appeal to every Senator as being addressed to the merit of the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. On behalf of the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, from which committee the bill (S. 2680) amending "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893, was reported, and in the absence of the chairman of that committee, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], I feel authorized to say that the committee is not desirous just now of pressing that bill and is quite willing that the bill in which the Senator from Montana is interested shall take the place of the unfinished business, instead of Senate bill 2680, if the Senate is willing that that action shall be taken.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection made to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and the order is made. Senate bill 4545 will be placed first upon the list of unfinished business. The places will be exchanged.

BONDS RETIRED BETWEEN 1865 AND 1892.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 4th instant, a statement of the aggregate amount of bonds retired between August 31, 1865, and July 1, 1892, and the aggregate of premium paid in the purchase of the bonds over and above their face value; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 4577) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Anacostia or Eastern Branch of the Potomac River, in a line with Massachusetts avenue extended; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BAKER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8581) for the protection of the people of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPOONER submitted an amendment to the paragraph in the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year 1898 providing for the adjustment of the account of J. Montgomery Smith, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

JOSEPH M'GUCKIAN.

Mr. WELLINGTON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Joseph McGuckian be appointed a special watchman at a salary of $60 per month, to be paid monthly out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that he be assigned to aid H. H. Lemon in the Dome of the Capitol, who was appointed a policeman by joint resolution approved July 7, 1882.

BOOKS IN USE OF SENATE.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That all clerks to committees and clerks to Senators shall report to the Secretary of the Senate at the close of each session of Congress a full and complete list of all books in their respective rooms in the Capitol and annex belonging to the United States (except ordinary public documents), and the Secretary of the Senate shall cause such list of books to be filed in the library of the Senate; and in case of failure of any clerk to report as aforesaid, or in case of loss of any books, it shall be the duty of the Secretary to report the facts to such chairman or Senators

ADDITIONAL COALING STATIONS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to make inquiry concerning the expediency of securing and establishing for the United States additional coaling stations at suitable points in foreign waters; and as to each coaling station which may be deemed necessary, to ascertain what should be its dimensions, the conditions and expenses of occupancy and maintenance, and the best method of securing the right to maintain such station, and report by bill or otherwise.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 9815) appointing commissioners to revise the statutes relating to patents, trade-marks, and trade and commercial names was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The bill (H. R. 10222) to authorize the extension of the Metropolitan Railroad was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to make the request that to-morrow, after the routine morning business is completed, thirty minutes be given to the consideration of unobjected bills on the Private Pension Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator simply give notice, or does he ask consent?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask consent this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request that thirty minutes to-morrow morning, after the morning business, be given for the consideration of private pension bills? The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 7th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 924) to authorize the Washington and Glen Echo Railroad Company to obtain a right of way and construct tracks into the District of Columbia 600 feet; and

An act (S. 1133) to pay to the Richmond Locomotive and Machine Works its claim for damages and losses incurred in the construction of the armored battle ship Texas.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 10th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1773) to amend the military record of George F. Miller.

MILLE LAC INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 245) declaring the lands within the former Mille Lac Indian Reservation, in Minnesota, to be subject to entry under the land laws of the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on page 2 of the report, be read.

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the joint resolution relates to only about 14,000 acres, and it is approved by the Interior Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. Just let the report from the Land Office be read. That is all.

Mr. NELSON. It is on page 2, commencing at the middle of the page.

The Secretary read from the report submitted by Mr. NELSON from the Committee on Public Lands May 9, 1898, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 1, 1898.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive, by departmental reference under date of January 13, 1897, for early report in duplicate and return of papers, a letter from the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives, inclosing the bill (H. R. 5178) allowing actual settlers upon lands within the Mille Lac Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, to perfect title to lands in said reservation under the general land laws of the United States.

In reply I have the honor to state that said bill is identical with one (H. R. 4993) upon which this office made report on May 28, 1896.

The Mille Lac Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, was established in accordance with the stipulations in article 2 of the treaty of February 22, 1855 (10 Stat., 1165), with the Chippewa Indians.

By the treaties of March 11, 1863 (12 Stat., 1249), May 7, 1864 (13 Stat., 695), and March 19, 1867 (16 Stat., 719), this reservation and others were ceded to the United States, other lands being reserved for said Indians in lieu of those ceded. In both the treaty of March 11, 1863, and the subsequent treaty of May 7, 1864, it was provided—

That owing to the heretofore good conduct of the Mille Lac Indians, they shall not be compelled to remove so long as they shall not interfere with or in any manner molest the persons or property of the whites.

The act of Congress of July 4, 1884 (23 Stat., 89), provided that said lands "shall not be patented or disposed of in any manner until further legislation by Congress."

Prior to July, 1884, a number of entries, filings, and selections had been made for lands in the Mille Lac Reservation, and, by decision of January 9, 1891, the Department held that these were confirmed by the proviso to section 6 of the said act of January 14, 1889. (See 12 L. D., 52.) And under date of January 21, 1891, the Department, in response to an inquiry by this office, stated that the Mille Lac lands should be disposed of as other public lands.

On September 3, 1891, the Department held (13 L. D., 230) that the Mille Lac lands were subject to disposal under the special provisions of the act of January 14, 1889, supra, and when attention was called by this office to the discrepancy between the rulings of January 21, 1891, and September 3, 1891, the Department decided, on April 22, 1892 (14 L. D., 497), that the Mille Lac lands are not subject to disposition under the general land laws, but under the special provision of the act of January 14, 1889. During the period between the decision of January 21, 1891, and April 22, 1892, a large number of entries and filings to these lands had been allowed, and these were confirmed by the joint resolution of December 19, 1893 (28 Stat., 576).

Of the lands in this reservation it appears from the records of this office that about 12,796.99 acres are embraced in the pending entries, filings, selections, and rejected homestead applications; 42,685.44 acres have been patented, and that there remain about 5,305.24 acres unappropriated, of which 3,022.32 acres are in sections 16 and 36. Owing to the fact that action is being taken from time to time on these entries, filings, selections, and applications, the above figures are necessarily only approximately correct.

On January 14, 1889, Congress passed "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota." (25 Stat., 642.) The first section of said act authorizes and directs the President to appoint three commissioners, whose duty it shall be, as soon as practicable after their appointment, to negotiate with all the different bands or tribes of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota for the complete cession and relinquishment, in writing, of all their title and interest in and to all the reservations of said Indians in the State of Minnesota except the White Earth and Red Lake reservations.

Section 3 of said act provides for the removal of all Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, except those on the Red Lake Reservation, to the White Earth Reservation, and for the allotment, in conformity with the act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat., 388), to the Red Lake Indians of lands on that reservation, and to the other said Indians lands on the White Earth Reservation. Said section further provides:

That any of the Indians residing on any of said reservations may, in his discretion, take his allotment in severalty under this act on the reservation where he lives at the time the removal herein provided for is effected, instead of being removed to and taking such allotment on White Earth Reservation.

No specific mention is made in this act of the Mille Lac Indians and the lands occupied by them, which, as was stated above, were ceded to the United States in 1863. However, the Mille Lacs were treated with under said act.

The assent, acceptance, or ratification of the said Mille Lac Indians was executed on October 5, 1889, and after reciting that the act of January 14, 1889, above, had been read, interpreted, and thoroughly explained to their understanding, and after expressing their consent to, acceptance, and ratification of said act, stated that they—

Do hereby grant, cede, relinquish, and convey to the United States all our right, title, and interest in and to all and so much of the White Earth Reservation as is not required and reserved under and in accordance with the provisions of said act, to make and fill the allotments, * * * and we do also hereby grant, cede, and relinquish to the United States, for the purposes and upon the terms stated in said act, all our right, title, and interest in and to the land reserved by us and described in the first article * * * of the treaty * * * proclaimed April 18, 1867 (16 Stat., 719), and also to the aforesaid executive addition thereto; * * * we do also hereby cede and relinquish to the United States all our right, title, and interest in and to all and so much of the Red Lake Reservation as is not required and reserved under and in accordance with the provisions of said act to make and fill the allotments to the Red Lake Indians in quantity and manner as therein provided; and we do also hereby forever relinquish to the United States the right of occupancy on the Mille Lac Reservation reserved to us by the twelfth article of the treaty of May 7, 1864 (13 Stat., 693). (See page 45, H. R. Ex. Doc. 247, Fifty-first Congress, first session.)

The words of the last clause seem clearly to have been an exercise of the right of election authorized by the proviso to section 3 of the act above mentioned. Said words were not necessary to the extinguishment of the title of said Indians to the lands, the words occurring before in the agreement being sufficient for that purpose. Having elected in this manner not to take the allotments on what was their own particular reservation, they can only properly take on the White Earth Reservation. Thus any hindrance on this account to the passage of the bill is removed.

It may be proper to add that at any rate the land is insufficient in quantity and unfit in quality for the purpose of allotment.

The said act of January 14, 1889, provides that the unallotted and unreserved land of said Chippewa Reservation shall be disposed of for the benefit of said Indians, and the bill makes no provision for the reimbursement of the fund to be derived from the sale of the said land on account of any lands to be entered under the proposed legislation.

However, in view of the fact that much of said lands is already covered by filings, selections, and claims, as hereinbefore stated, and in view of the waiver of the right by said Indians to elect to take the lands as above stated, to say nothing of the insufficiency and unsuitability of said lands for such purpose, and of the equity of the claimants to said lands by reason of the departmental decisions above referred to, I am impelled to look favorably on the proposed legislation, and I therefore have the honor to recommend the passage of the bill.

It is asserted that there are burial grounds of the said Indian band located on said land, and that the Indians feel an attachment for the locality on that account. It might be well for Congress to make some provisions for the perpetual reservation of said burial grounds, or the removal of the dead buried therein to the White Earth Reservation.

The bill and accompanying letter are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

BINGER HERMANN, Commissioner.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the Secretary read from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, dated March 18, 1898, on page 4 of the report, beginning "From the facts in the case, as disclosed by the reports of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs."

The Secretary read as follows:

From the facts in the case, as disclosed by the reports of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, it appears that by treaties in 1863-64 these Indians ceded all their lands in this reservation to the Government, taking other lands in lieu thereof; that they were permitted by the terms of said treaty to remain on said reservation so long as they did not interfere with the persons or property of the whites, and that by further treaty or agreement, dated October 5, 1889, entered into with the commissioners appointed under the act of January 14, 1889 (25 Stat., 694), known as the Nelson Act, they relinquish their right of occupancy on said reservation after electing not to take any allotments on that reservation, which, under the terms of the Nelson Act, they might have done.

It would appear, therefore, that the Indians, after due consideration and in the most formal manner, have, by treaty and agreement duly executed, parted with all their rights to the lands in this reservation. That being true, it is not apparent why the equities of settlers who have in good faith gone upon these lands under the belief that they were vacant public lands of the United States, and made valuable improvements on them, should not be recognized by the passage of some law that would permit said settlers to perfect their title to said lands. Such an act would be no infringement upon the rights of the Indians, for the reasons above stated.

It further appears that these lands do not come under either of the two classes of lands referred to in my letter of the 5th instant with reference to H. R. 6393, known as the "free-home bill," and hence the passage of such a bill as I have suggested would not conflict with the opinions expressed in my letter of that date, nor with the policy therein recommended.

In this connection, your attention is called to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on House resolution No. 35. It appears to me that if this resolution were amended in accordance with the suggestion of the Commissioner in respect to preemption filings, and in accordance with the recommendation of the said Commissioner and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in reference to protecting the burial grounds of said Indians, said resolution would better accomplish the purpose desired.

I would therefore recommend, when the same is amended as hereinafter suggested, the substitution of House resolution 35 for H. R. 5178, and its enactment into law; and the amendments I would recommend to said resolution are as follows:

In line 6 of said resolution omit, after the word "under," "the preemption or homestead," and insert in lieu thereof "the public land;" and after the word "made," in line 8, insert "prior to the repeal of the preemption law by the act of March 3, 1891," or "prior to March 3, 1891." The latter expression would probably be better, because briefer.

After the word "entry," in line 11 of said resolution, there should be added a provision looking to the protection of the burial grounds of said Indians on said reservation.

Very respectfully,

C. N. BLISS,
Secretary.

HON. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. COCKRELL. Those amendments, I understand, were made in the House.

Mr. NELSON. All those amendments are incorporated in the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ECKINGTON AND SOLDIERS' HOME RAILWAY.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the two railroad bills which were up a few days ago, House bill 6148 and House bill 8541. These are known as the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway and the Belt Railway bills. Both roads are in the hands of the courts, and it is very important that some legislative action should be taken to enable them to reorganize. These bills have been on the Calendar for a long time. I have been prevented from calling them up from time to time. I ask unanimous consent that they may be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is asked for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6148) to amend the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company, of the District of Columbia, the Maryland and Washington Railway Company, and for other purposes. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I will state that the bill has been read and the amendments of the Committee on the District of Columbia have been agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I offer an amendment to the pending bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "and," first appearing in line 7, section 1, insert the words "that part of the property and franchises;" and after the word "Maryland," first appearing in line 8, section 1, insert the words "lying between the District line and the town of Laurel, Md."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer an amendment to come in as an additional section to the bill.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

That at any time after five years from the date of the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or the Government of the United States, may acquire all the property of said company, by purchase or otherwise, for its actual value at the time the same is so acquired, without taking into account the value of any franchise now or heretofore granted, and may operate the same in the interest of the public, and the rights and privileges hereby granted shall be for a period of not to exceed twenty years, unless previously purchased as herein provided.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, all I desire, of course, is the adoption of the amendment. I do not care to discuss the question if there is no opposition to it. This bill confers very extensive and important powers. When the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railroad Company was organized, the amount of capital stock that could be issued was limited by law. This bill allows an unlimited issue of capital stock.

All previous charters granted by Congress for street railroads in the District of Columbia have been carefully guarded in this respect, and provisions have been inserted that the capital stock should not exceed the amount of money actually expended in the construction of a road. The purpose of the legislators was to prevent the watering of stock, hoping, at some time, through this precaution, to be able to secure a reduction of the fares charged. I wish to call attention to section 2 of the bill. It provides:

That the powers conferred in an act entitled "An act relative to the Rock Creek Railway Company of the District of Columbia" (now the Capital Traction Company), approved March 1, 1895, relative to joint management, lease, purchase, or sale of connecting or intersecting lines, are hereby conferred upon the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company and all other street railway companies in the District of Columbia.

In other words, under this proposed act any street railway corporation in the District of Columbia that wishes to evade the provisions of its charter with regard to the issue of capital stock can purchase any other railroad company in the District of Columbia, and then issue all the stock it pleases, to an unlimited extent, and thus hamper the future with this enormous overcapitalization. The provision of the act to which this section refers is as follows:

An act relative to Rock Creek Railway Company of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Rock Creek Railway Company of the District of Columbia, being authorized thereto by a vote of the owners of a majority of its capital stock, may contract with any street railway company owning or operating a connecting or intersecting line for the joint management, lease, or purchase of such connecting or intersecting line or lines, and operate the same in connection with its original line.

* * * * * * *

Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to impair or abridge the right of Congress at any time to regulate the operation of such line or lines, or to release any railway company or companies thus contracting, in whole or in part, from any obligation or restriction imposed by its original charter or by any law of Congress subsequently enacted, except as provided herein.

Now, here is the exception:

Except as provided herein; and in case of such contract may provide the means necessary by an increase of its capital stock, not to exceed the actual consideration paid or the actual cost of the necessary equipment.

In other words, the pending bill provides that the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Company can buy the property of any other railroad company in this city, and issue any amount of stock they can agree upon. They can purchase the Belt Line road, and that is what they contemplate, and issue as much stock as they may agree shall be issued, and that stock is the consideration. We have an illustration of the operation of the bill in the case of the Rock Creek Company. The name of the company was changed to the Traction Company. This company bought the Washington and Georgetown Railroad property and issued $12,000,000 worth of stock. The late charter of the Washington and Georgetown Company limited the issue of stock to, I think, $500,000, but under this scheme, under this unlimited and unbounded authority, the company has issued $12,000,000 worth of stock.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the fact that they have issued, besides $500,000 of stock, about four million and a half of bonds to complete their cable road, and that they had a great deal of other property, amounting to about one and a half or two million dollars, which was put in the consolidation of the Rock Creek Company, making an actual outlay, so far as their reports show, of some $8,000,000 for the two properties.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to state further that, so far as the Rock Creek Company is concerned, the stock that went to the stockholders of that company had been paid for dollar for dollar. The stock that that company received was only equivalent to the actual amount expended, dollar for dollar, and the stock is now worth only about 70. As far as the Rock Creek Company is concerned, those who built that road got only the stock, worth about 70 cents on the dollar, for their actual expenditure.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall accept the statements of both Senators in this connection. According to the statement of the Senator from Michigan, both properties, under whatever scheme of extravagance they may have been constructed, covered an investment of $8,000,000, and there has been issued stock to the amount of $12,000,000. What Senator supposes there will ever be any reduction in fare upon this road until it will pay more than a dividend upon the whole $12,000,000? What is the purpose of issuing $12,000,000 worth of stock? Because they hope and believe that if they can continue to tax the public in the future as in the past the road will yield a revenue on $12,000,000. Who is entitled to this $4,000,000 then? It seems to me it is the public, who are entitled to the values represented in its franchise and in the streets it occupies.

This is one of the methods so common to corporate organization throughout the country, which has resulted in uneven, dishonest, and unfair distribution of wealth—a procedure that is responsible for the dissatisfaction that exists among our people. It is for the purpose of stopping this sort of practice in the future that I address myself to this question. It is for the purpose of preventing the watering of stock, preventing the capitalization of these roads above what they are worth, above what the property is actually worth without any franchise, that I offer my amendment. If this bill passes and the owners of the property purchase, under its provisions, the Belt Line road, as they intend to do, then they can capitalize for any sum they choose and mortgage the future to an unlimited extent.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota a question in regard to the meaning of his amendment, which he can answer at some time convenient to him. I think there is great weight of argument in favor of the suggestion of some right of the public to purchase; and they should not pay for what they themselves gave—to wit, the right to use the streets. But what will be the value of the subterranean tunnel, the underground trolley, or whatever system is used—the cost of the cavern through the city, separated from the franchise? Would this amendment authorize the company to charge to the public the cost of laying trolleys under ground and all the mechanism which runs the cars, which I suppose would be absolutely worthless without the right to use it in the streets, but which at the same time constitutes the chief value of the fixed property of the company? My question is whether the Senator has that so framed as to be, in his judgment, absolutely just to both sides?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I have the impression that we would pay what it would cost to reproduce it at the time we took the property. However, I would be very much pleased to have the Senator from Massachusetts suggest any amendment to my amendment which would thoroughly safeguard the investment and the public, and I would be very glad to accept such an amendment. What I aim at is to limit these charters, so as to leave it in our power to purchase the property. My object is to prevent the sale of stocks and bonds on the strength of the contemplated value of the right to use the streets, so that we can retake the property and some day put in a system of street-car lines in the city of Washington which shall all be under one management, under one control, under one head, whereby one fare, by proper exchanges, will enable a passenger to reach any portion of the city, so that the rich lines, the lines on our best thoroughfares, will pay the expenses of operating the lines in the more sparsely populated and distant portions of the city, and so that every part may be equally well served. That is my purpose. I hope that that time will come. Believing that it has not yet come, I offer the amendment simply to empower us to take advantage of an opportunity and purchase the property when the time arrives.

We are conferring power and privileges. We are conferring by these two bills, the Eckington and Soldiers' Home bill and the Belt Line bill, when the two roads are consolidated, a right to occupy a vast number of the streets of this city and a franchise that, in the future, must be worth millions upon millions of money. I really think the time has come, and that we ought today to purchase these properties and occupy these streets with lines laid down by the Government; but for the purpose of providing that in the future we may do so, I simply seek to amend these two bills as I have proposed. There should be no opposition to it.

This question has been discussed; the experiment has been tried all over the world; municipalities are acquiring possession and title to street railway properties and operating them in the interest of the public; where they are not doing that they are selling the franchises; and where they do not sell the franchises they lease the roads or they impose conditions by which a revenue is derived, or conditions by which exceedingly cheap fares are secured to the public. For my part, I prefer cheap fares to the public. I do not think we should acquire revenue. I believe the occupation and use of streets belong to the public, to everybody, and that no revenue should be derived therefrom. Whenever it occurs that the operating expense is less than the income, fares should be reduced, and the public given the benefit of such reduction. It does not make so much difference to Senators and to wealthy men in a community whether they pay 5 cents or 3 cents fare, but it makes a vast difference to the laborer whether he pays 2 cents for a ticket or 5 cents for a ticket.

It is those people who are the bone and muscle and the element of success and prosperity in every city who should be provided for. The rich do not use to any great extent street-car lines; they are able to employ other means of conveyance, but to the poor people cheap transportation means much.

Besides that, I think Washington should be the model city. We ought to provide for the best service; we ought to make it the most attractive city; we ought to create an example for other cities of this country to follow. It is incumbent upon us, therefore, to so legislate as to attain these ends.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if that is not the fact now? Is there any other city that has as good a street-car service as, when the Capital Traction Company completes its road, will be given in the city of Washington? Does the Senator know of any?

Mr. PETTIGREW. There are two lines in this city that give excellent service and both charge high prices; but the other lines of this city are probably as wretched as any in the world.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me again, that is true; but it is not true that they charge high prices. They charge lower prices than are charged in any city of which I have knowledge, and the Senator ought not to forget that those other lines, which have constantly lost money and which are unable to give good service, are to be consolidated into one line if this bill passes, and we shall then have a third model railway in the city of Washington.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Perhaps we shall, and perhaps not. Five years ago the Eckington line was sold out, and we were given this same promise, but it did not materialize. The fact is, we get good service only after the profit becomes enormous, while, if we owned the lines, we would receive good service before that time came. If these two great lines were owned by the city and operated by the city, the profit upon them would give us good service upon all the other lines, without waiting, with a wretched service, until the population becomes so dense that railway companies can pay a dividend upon watered stock. It is to meet that very objection that I have offered the amendment.

Mr. HALE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I have not had the opportunity to examine the bills which the Senator proposes to amend. Does the pending bill provide for a consolidation into one company of these outlying companies which have poor lines at present?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It practically provides for the purchase, by the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Company, of the Belt Line Company.

Mr. HALE. So that it will bring into one company most of these inferior roads?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Two of these inferior roads.

Mr. HALE. Does it give any additional privileges as to the right of way over new streets not covered by the present lines?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The chairman of the committee can answer that question.

Mr. McMILLAN. The purpose of this bill is to enable the old Eckington Company to consolidate with the Belt Line and the Washington and Maryland line, so as to connect with the road to Baltimore. The parties who propose to put money into these two roads believe that by doing so they will be able to give to the people an underground system in the city and the use of the trolley outside of the city, which will enable the company to make some money. They are now running behind from one hundred and fifty to three hundred dollars a day.

Mr. HALE. Now I will renew the question whether in connection with the unifying of these companies into one company they are given by the provisions of the bill the right over any new streets that are not covered by the present lines run by any of these companies?

Mr. McMILLAN. They are not. There are one or two slight changes made as to extensions.

Mr. HALE. By way of connection?

Mr. McMILLAN. By way of improving the route; for instance, to avoid going around sharp curves. Outside of that there are no new extensions to these lines.

Mr. HALE. Then what is the objection to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. McMILLAN. The objection is that if the amendment passes the people who are now willing to put their money into this property will not put it in, because the time which the Senator proposes to give is too short; it is but five years. That would hardly enable these gentlemen to get the property completed and the underground system put in before the road might be purchased by the District. I do not think the class of people who are interested in the matter would put up money under such circumstances.

Mr. HALE. Would it take five years to set up this new corporation in successful business?

Mr. McMILLAN. It would take about a year and a half or two years to put in the system and complete it.

Mr. HALE. What are the provisions of the Senator's amendment as to the valuation in taking the property?

Mr. PETTIGREW. They are to pay the full value of the property, not estimating the franchise.

Mr. HALE. At the time?

Mr. PETTIGREW. At the time.

Mr. HALE. When it is taken?

Mr. PETTIGREW. When it is taken. This gives the option to take it if we desire to do so.

Mr. HOAR. I should like very much to call the Senator's attention to the point about which I asked him before, and also the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] who is considering the question.

I think there is great reason for effecting the purpose which the Senator from South Dakota proposes; but I wish to ask him to consider whether the amendment does justly and fairly effect that purpose. He proposes to take this property on paying the value, without considering or estimating the franchise. Now, the whole of the property, except the moving stock, which might be sold to some other company, depends for its value on the franchise. It is almost like saying you shall pay for a pair of scissors the value of one of the blades without taking into consideration the other blade, or that you shall pay for a jackknife what the blade would be worth if there was not any handle to it.

It strikes me that the more just way of effecting the Senator's purpose would be to make a strict provision in regard to the keeping of accounts, making highly penal provisions upon the officers of the roads, so that their accounts must be kept honestly, and must be submitted to some public auditing, if that does not exist now, and then to say that at some future time the public may take the property on paying what the corporation has actually paid out in cash for it, deducting what it has received by way of income or otherwise, allowing them a reasonable, moderate percentage, say 5 or 6 per cent, or whatever would be a moderate percentage in the Senator's judgment.

Perhaps I am prejudiced in favor of that way of dealing with the subject, because that is the mode which has been adopted in my own State for a great many years on very full and careful consideration, and I believe has given satisfaction; that is, if a railroad in Massachusetts—say, for instance, the Boston and Albany—finds it is making an excessive amount of money out of the public it puts the surplus into accommodations to the public. That has been the way it has been done, and that is the way it should be done if the Senator desires to effect that object.

I mention this with great diffidence, because I have not considered the subject as fully as the Senator has, but it seems to me it is the better way to get at the result.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator from Massachusetts in that respect.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORMAN. I have not been able to hear a word of the private conversation going on on the other side of the Chamber, but I think I understand the general drift of the statement of the Senator from South Dakota, and I want to make an appeal to him to withdraw the amendment to this bill; and if he will pardon me for making a short statement in regard to the matter, I think he will agree to withdraw it.

As the law stands, under the act passed two years ago, Congress has granted to one company in the District of Columbia—the Washington and Georgetown, now known as the Capital Traction Company—full authority to purchase any other street railroad within the city which they intersect or cross or with which they connect. That is the only authority existing by law for anybody to acquire one of these railroad properties. That company, therefore, has the monopoly of the right to purchase, because of legislation heretofore had, and I think, by reason of the restrictions imposed by the Commissioners and other authorities, the Eckington road and the Belt road have become bankrupt, and they are to be sold by order of the court. The people connected with the Eckington road have sunk over $2,000,000 in conducting their road and constructing new lines, and now the road must be sold. So with the Belt road. The bondholders of the Belt road, as well as the stockholders, are unable to protect themselves under this forced sale. This bill simply provides that they shall have the power to purchase their own property and bid against the only other bidder who can come in under the law. There is nothing proposed to be given them beyond that.

There is nothing new in the Senator's amendment. The same provision exists in other cities of the country. Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, it would be utterly impossible for the owners of this road, who have spent so much money, to raise a sufficient amount to buy the franchise, and so the property will be lost in the end, and it will pass into the hands of the Capital Traction Company, which alone has the right to acquire all these properties. That would be an act of great injustice. It would be destructive, in my judgment, to all the interests of the District.

Mr. HALE. The Senator thinks that the inevitable result will be that this whole interest will be swallowed up by the Capital Traction Company?

Mr. GORMAN. Under the law nobody else can acquire this property. The bondholders of the Belt Railroad, who desire to buy in their own property, have no power to acquire it; they have no charter; they can not get a franchise, and the property will be of no use to them. So with the Eckington road. It is to correct that that the provision is inserted which authorizes the company to increase its capital stock—not to an unlimited amount, as the Senator suggests, but to an amount that will be sufficient to acquire the property and put in the underground system under the supervision of the District Commissioners. In view of the fact that the properties are to be put up at public sale, there is no other way to manage the case except that which I have proposed, and there can be no abuse.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator believe that nobody but the Capital Traction Company can bid?

Mr. GORMAN. I say nobody but that company can acquire the franchise of that road, and it would be unsafe to leave it in that condition.

Mr. STEWART. It is absolutely necessary, if these roads are to be revived and do business, that they shall combine their franchises to a great extent, because separately they can not live; they can not accommodate the public.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to say that I agree with very much the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] has said as to the great abuses in this matter; that is to say, we have dealt with the railroads with more liberality than they have been dealt with in any other city in the country. In the matter of taxation there has been great inequality; but each of these charters Congress has the right to amend and improve. There is pending in the Senate, and now lying on the table, a bill which comes from the other House, fixing the amount of taxation upon these roads, where a general provision, which would apply to all of them, can be adopted, substantially such as the Senator from South Dakota now proposes; and it can be done so as to make the matter uniform and apply to each one of the roads, and at the same time adjust the amount of taxation.

I agree with very much that the Senator has said as to taxation, and I shall be glad to join in much that he proposes; but in this particular case it would work a great hardship to men who have lost a great deal of money, to my knowledge, and the Senator must be aware of that. As to one of these lines, which extends 18 miles out into Maryland, a great portion of it with the iron laid down, and a part of which is being operated, I know they have lost nearly $2,000,000 in the enterprise. Now, they only want an opportunity to save what they can out of the wreck, and yet give within the city a fair service.

Under the circumstances, I think the Senator ought to postpone the offering of his amendment and make his fight on the tax bill, which is here and which must come up; and we can then join him and make the provision apply equally to all the roads.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The tax question is another question, and I am opposed to it. Therefore there is no chance for the Senator and myself to get together.

Whenever the revenue of a road exceeds the operating expenses, it should proceed to reduce fares to the public. I would rather give $5 a year to 200,000 of the people of Washington as a result of this reduction than to give a million dollars to a corporation. It would result in better government, in better feeling, in better living.

However, the objection raised by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] can be obviated without trouble. Instead of inserting a provision in this bill, in section 2, that this railroad company and all other railroad companies in the District of Columbia may purchase any other company whose tracks intercept with their own, we can simply say:

The provisions of the act of March 1, 1895, in relation to the Rock Creek Railroad Company, authorizing them to purchase intersecting lines, are hereby repealed.

Instead of giving this unlimited power to issue stock and water stock and burden and mortgage the future, inasmuch as we have made a mistake in the past, let us repeal that mistake and obviate future difficulty. Of course the argument that somebody has lost money in this transaction is one that enters not into this debate; for if we are to legislate to help out everybody who has lost money, then everybody who produces in this country would come in for legislation which would redistribute the wealth of the whole country upon almost an equal per capita basis.

The question is, What shall we do for the public and for the future, and what is the proper thing to do in order to safeguard the interests of this city and make it an object of pride to every American citizen? We are behind in this respect. We issue unlimited charters. We add to our charters a provision that "Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act"—idle words, unworthy of a place in an act of Congress. That is a right we can not take away; it is a right which exists for future Congresses to repeal all our acts; but rights may have grown up under those acts with which we can not interfere; and we certainly can not interfere merely because we put in the idle words that "Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

That provision must have been placed in the bills to satisfy the public on this question. If any Senator will think a moment about it, he will see that they are useless words, an idle sentence, and one unfit to be made a part of an act of Congress. It is a provision that used to be put into the laws of Territorial legislatures on the frontier. I hardly ever remember seeing such an expression in the statutes of any State of the Union, and it is in none of the other statutes that I know of that we pass except when we confer a charter on a street railroad company in the city of Washington.

Mr. President, this act gives for all future time the right to this company to occupy the streets now occupied by them; and the Belt Line road and the Eckington and Soldiers' Home road having gone into the hands of a receiver, and are about to be sold by the court, therefore they come here for a new charter. They are to acquire the property of the Belt Line road, and under this act they are to issue stock, and in such case such contract may provide the means necessary for an increase of the capital stock, not to exceed the new consideration paid on the actual cost of the necessary equipment. What does that mean? That the Belt Line road when they sell, having a perfect understanding with the Eckington Company, can make the consideration any sum they choose, any number of millions and millions of stock, just as the Washington and Georgetown Company did, and thus evade the law, heretofore enacted in reference to these companies, limiting the amount of capital stock they may issue.

If we pass this bill, we provide that every company in the city of Washington can go on and issue unlimited quantities of stock, and we repeal every provision we have made in the past when we issued these charters, in which we limited the amount of capital stock, and say to them, "If you purchase a piece of a road somewhere, you may issue all the stock you please." It seems to me strange that the Committee on the District of Columbia should report any such bill, through which the future can be mortgaged to an unlimited extent. In the advocacy of this question, in the desire to limit the rights and the powers conferred and to retain to the city, to the Government, the valuable right to occupy the streets of the city, I am not prompted by any sentiment of socialism, but by what I believe to be sound business principles, backed by precedents innumerable, both in this country and in Europe.

We ought to have in this capital city the best street-railway system in the world, charging the least fare and furnishing an example for the other cities of the land. There is no reason why, if we had properly safeguarded the matter, the two profitable lines would not now be carrying the people in this city for 3-cent fares instead of 5 cents. The effort to pay interest on $12,000,000 of capital, $4,000,000 being watered stock, causes the trouble; and everyone knows that fares will never be reduced until dividends are paid on the entire capitalization.

Toronto has had experience in this respect. While I do not bring forward the experience of Toronto as one that should be followed, it is a thousand times preferable to the policy we are pursuing.

Toronto in 1891 bought her street railroads. She operated them for six months at a profit of $25,000 per month and then sold them on the following conditions for what they cost: Eight hundred dollars per mile per year to be paid into the city treasury, 8 per cent of the gross receipts up to $1,000,000, 10 per cent up to one and one-half million dollars of the gross receipts, 12 per cent from one and a half to two million dollars of the gross receipts, 15 per cent on the receipts up to $3,000,000, and 20 per cent on all the receipts over $3,000,000.

The result has been that they sell six tickets for a quarter during the day and eight in the morning and evening, and by this arrangement the laboring people can get back and forth from their work to their homes at 3 cents a passage. After twenty years the city can take the plant at its actual value. I aimed in drawing my amendment to follow as near as I could the terms of the contract made between the city of Toronto and its street railroad companies.

The companies purchasing this plant cleared $20,000 net per month in 1894 and $30,000 in 1895. They have 80 miles of road, and it cost $3,000,000, with the entire plant as it stands now, with the 80 miles of road, while the Capital Traction Company, in this city, has 36 miles of road stocked for $12,000,000, or $333,000 a mile, stocked for more, I think, than any road in the world, except some pieces of road in New York. This Toronto road is bonded at $2,000,000 and stocked for $6,000,000, even with the twenty years' franchise, and paying the city $800 a mile for every track mile, and from 8 per cent to 20 per cent, according to the gross revenue; and yet they were able to stock it for $6,000,000 and bond it for $2,000,000, and have made an exceedingly profitable investment.

What the city of Toronto ought to have done was to have kept the property when she secured it and made her own improvements, and instead of making it a matter of profit, to have made it an opportunity for the reduction of fares. Under this contract in 1892 the city of Toronto received $18,000 mileage rental; in 1893 she received $55,000 mileage rental and $65,000 in percentages; in 1894 she received $58,000 mileage rental and $76,000 in percentages; in 1895, $60,000 through the clause providing that the company should pay $800 a track-mile and $78,000 in percentages on its earnings. So the railroads have paid into the city in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 up to date.

I find in Consular Reports Nos. 168 and 171 for 1894 the following:

The purchase and operation by the municipality of Glasgow of the street-car system of that city on or about the 1st of July, 1894, has resulted in better cars, cheaper fares, and more efficient service to the public. The street cars have so far been operated at a small profit to the city over and above running expenses and interest on the outlay of capital in the purchase.

Since that time they have gone on and improved the equipment—put in an electric system and made it a perfect success. So successful has Glasgow been in the operation of this line, that very many other cities of Great Britain have purchased their street-car lines and are now themselves operating them.

In 1894 Glasgow, with a population of 678,000, purchased her street-car lines, and since then London has acquired possession of many of the lines in that city. Liverpool, with a population of 518,000, has bought nearly all the lines in that city, and is operating them under its municipal government. Manchester, with a population of 454,000, has done the same; Leeds, with a population of 368,000, has followed suit. So with Sheffield, having a population of 324,000; Edinburgh, with a population of 268,000; Dublin, with a population of 254,000; Bradford, with a population of 216,000; Leicester, with a population of 175,000; Bolton, with a population of 115,000; Hubbersfield, with a population of 95,000; Plymouth, with a population of 84,000; Halifax, with a population of 83,000; St. Helens, with a population of 71,000; Newport, with a population of 55,000, and Blackpool, with a population of 23,000.

This has been done in all these cities and in London, where there is a population of 6,000,000. So it is no longer an experiment. This city ought to purchase the street-car lines at once. We are better situated to operate street-car lines than any city in the world, because we have a better government, because we have a government of three commissioners, by three executive officers, and this places Washington in a position to set an example to any city in this country or in any other country.

Let us see what has been the experience in Detroit. In Detroit the street cars charged a 5-cent fare.

Mayor Pingree said that a 3-cent fare in Detroit was enough. The companies declared it impossible. Outside capitalists thought otherwise, and offered to build a new road in Detroit. A franchise was granted the new company for 40 miles of railway, mostly in the outskirts of the city, on routes that had been considered unprofitable by the old companies.

Here we have roads, not only on the outskirts of the city, but running through the heart of the city, for the Belt Line, when properly equipped, will run through what will be the most profitable part of the city for railway purposes.

The new company agreed to sell eight tickets for a quarter, good from 5.45 a. m to 8 p. m., and six for a quarter good for the rest of the night. The new road was built and operated as agreed, furnishing excellent service and universal transfers. The men work ten hours a day and receive 21 cents an hour. The old companies reduced their fares to the new basis, and even made a 2½-cent rate on one of their lines. They had all the best streets and the sympathy and support of the wealthy and influential classes.

The average cost of operation for the year ending July 1, 1896, was 2.36 cents per passenger, and the average receipts were 3.3 cents per passenger. The cost of operation per car mile was 7 cents, and the receipts per car mile 10 cents, showing a profit of 5.3 per cent the first year on the total cost of construction, in spite of bad location, strenuous opposition, low fares, and a business of only 3 passengers per car mile. Boston has 7 passengers per car mile, and would have more if fares were reduced.

That is true.

If Detroit had seven passengers to the car mile the operating cost would be but a trifle more than a cent per passenger and a 2-cent fare would yield a handsome profit above all cost of operation and fixed charges.

The new company has offered to operate all the roads in Detroit at a uniform 2½-cent rate with free transfers all over the city, and pay interest on the purchase money if the city will take the roads by right of eminent domain under proper legislative authority.

Mr. McMILLIN. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota if he does not know that the new company is practically consolidated with the old company now?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Did the old company buy it out?

Mr. McMILLAN. It is practically run by the old company, and the two companies are working in harmony. They have not made very much money.

Mr. PETTIGREW. They were taken in by the old company. Even at these rates the business was so profitable that the old company took in the new one.

Mr. McMILLAN. The rate of fare in Detroit now on the main lines, and on nearly all the lines, is just the same as in Washington.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yet the new company has been absorbed, and so it will be anywhere. It only adds to the strength of my illustration. That will be true anywhere, but if the public owns the line, consolidation is impossible and the public will get the benefit.

This new company offered to take the whole city and give a fare of 2½ cents per passenger. The old company had to get them out of the way, and undoubtedly paid a large bonus in order to accomplish that purpose. But it shows conclusively that if the city of Detroit had taken the street-car lines and operated them they would have done it at a profit at 2½ cents per fare. That is exactly what I want to accomplish here. I am aware that if we give the franchise to a new company and they should compete, combination would follow and the public would suffer.

The effort to limit franchises in this regard is not a new one. In fact, it is being adopted by many of the States in the Union and it is receiving the attention of our city governments everywhere. The law of Minnesota provides:

No perpetual franchise shall ever be granted, nor shall any franchise be granted unless the question of granting the same shall have been first submitted to the qualified voters of such city and adopted by a majority voting at such election on the question, nor in any case for a longer period than ten years.

New York, after being ridden and robbed by corporate greed for years, has now taken steps to limit the extent of franchises, with a view ultimately of acquiring the property. The question is extensively discussed in a quarterly magazine entitled Municipal Affairs, in the September (1897) number; and an article written by John DeWitt Warner in favor of municipal ownership is well worthy of consideration. It is an exhaustive treatise on this subject. What I contend for is that public ownership is better and cheaper and more conducive to the public interest; that private ownership leads to watering of stock, stock-jobbing operations, corruption of city councils, and general demoralization. I propose to read some of the experiences, according to Mr. Warner, of cities with private corporations. Take the Union Traction Company of Philadelphia:

The present earning capacity of the railways now consolidated by the Union Traction Company is shown by the following table, which gives the figures for the year ending June 30, 1896. The figures quoted cover companies which operate nearly 95 per cent of the railway mileage of Philadelphia.

Then he proceeds to give the names of the companies, their gross earnings, $10,210,000; operating expenses, $5,368,000; net earnings, $4,874,000, and the cost of the road was $34,156,000. Now, let us see what this company is capitalized for. It has stock to the amount of $129,300,000, less stock in trust, $21,000,000; leaving $108,000,000 capitalization on a total cost of $34,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. What road is that?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Union Traction Company, of Philadelphia. Of course the public must pay on $108,000,000, and the company will let out the trust stock at the first opportunity when the market is good. The public will pay interest on $130,000,000 for what cost $34,000,000. The same process is going on here. We have a fair illustration in the Union Traction Company. They made net earnings of $4,874,000 and did not pay any dividends, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] says.

Mr. QUAY. I did not make mention of that fact to the Senator from South Dakota. This company has never paid any dividend, according to my recollection, although I have not noticed its transactions lately, and my impression is that the stock is selling for less than the amount paid in. The Senator from South Dakota has been examining the subject, however, and probably knows more about it than I do.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The article continues:

A glance at these figures shows that the present earning power of the Philadelphia companies is large. With the longest lines of any surface system in the country, the gross receipts per mile of track are above $24,000. This return on the basis of track mileage is exceeded by only 4 of the 17 surface systems of this country which operate 100 miles or more of track.

It appears, then, that they pay no dividends, but make a net earning of $4,874,000. Their property cost $34,000,000 and they stocked it for $129,000,000. It is for the purpose of preventing such examples as this, toward which we have already started, as shown in the sale of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, in this city, to the Traction Company, that I have offered the amendment.

The Capital Traction Company, of Washington, D. C., has 36 miles of track. It has a capitalization of $12,000,000 or $333,000 per mile. The capitalization of the Union Traction Company, of Philadelphia, is only $242,000 a mile, giving nearly $100,000 more for the line in this city than the line in Philadelphia.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the fact that the lines in Philadelphia are what are called trolley lines, while the lines in Washington are under ground and are very much more expensive, costing five times as much as trolley lines.

Mr. PETTIGREW. So far as the Traction Company in this city is concerned, its 36 miles of track embraces all tracks, and pretty nearly one-half of it, or a third of it, is composed of trolley lines, as everybody knows.

I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada whether the 36 miles of track are double or single track?

Mr. STEWART. I suppose it is single track. There are about 8 miles of double trolley track. The balance of it is under ground. It was cable, but now it has been changed to the other system.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The trolley line runs from the head of Eighteenth street, or about there, way out through Chevy Chase to the railroad track. The distance must be fully 6 miles, or 12 miles of single track, which is one-third of the entire system of 36 miles.

Mr. STEWART. It is only five miles and a little over from the White House to the line, and you have to take off about a mile and a half or two miles. It is between 3 and 4 miles.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It seemed to me in riding over the road that it was much more than that. Of course the Senator from Nevada must know. That track out in the wild country is stocked for $333,000 a single-track mile.

Mr. STEWART. What does the Senator suppose that track cost?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I suppose it cost not to exceed $25,000 a mile.

Mr. STEWART. In the first place, the company gave the city the land, which was valued at over $100,000; they built two bridges on the line, costing $150,000; they spent $250,000 in grading the road. That is independent of building the road.

Mr. GALLINGER. It runs through a very hilly country.

Mr. STEWART. It runs through a very hilly country. They gave over $100,000 worth of land; they spent over $250,000 in grading and $150,000 in bridges, independent of the road. The stock that company has got is not to-day worth more than 75 cents on the dollar of the actual money paid in. There is no great speculation in that.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Those people manifested great enterprise in buying pasture land in that region, where no one lived, and grading their grand streets through it, building bridges, so as to make the property accessible and be able to sell it out as town lots. That is a speculation. The building of the bridges and the grading of the road was purely a real-estate transaction and has no connection whatever with this question. The question is what, after the street was graded and given to the public, is the equipment that they have placed upon it worth?

Mr. STEWART. It has nothing to do with it that they give the streets to that extent and build bridges and give them to the city?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Where people lay out a town they generally dedicate the streets to the public in order to sell lots; and that is just what they did in this case.

Mr. STEWART. I wish the balance of them would.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is what they ought to do and what they are required to do in almost every city in the land.

Mr. STEWART. They do not do it in this city.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know what the practice is here. I know what it ought to be.

Leeds has operated her street railways since February, 1894, thus anticipating by a few months Glasgow's experiment in a similar direction and meeting like success—prompt betterment and increase of facilities and lowering of fare for the public—at the same time that better wages for shorter hours were paid the employees. The footnote below is condensed from a full memorandum just received from the town clerk of Leeds:

"I am unable to send you copies of the accounts, but the following extracts will show that the working of the tramways by the corporation has been a financial success."

Where he says "corporation" in the last line, he means the municipal corporation.

Then he proceeds to give the car receipts. The total receipts from March, 1896, to March, 1897, were £64,000; total expenses, £50,000; net profits, £9,000.

Sheffield has just completed her first year of municipal operation of her street railways, which is thus summed up editorially by London in its issue of August 19, 1897: "A year of municipal tramways in Sheffield has brought a clear gain of over £3,000 (net) to the corporation, has produced 2,000,000 additional passengers, has secured to the men an extra £2,500 in wages, with free uniforms and other advantages (including shorter labor hours), and, having secured a better service, has further led the city council to adopt electric traction;" while the itemized statement of a count published in another column states, and apparently shows, that the corporation committee had charged themselves with every item they fairly could.

Dublin's experience, though scarcely as pertinent, is equally interesting. Local tramway service has become so unsatisfactory that, after struggling with such conditions under its present operation by a private horse tramway company, on November 2, 1896, the city council resolved—

"That the time has come when the corporation (of Dublin) should seek Parliamentary powers to enable them to construct, purchase or lease, and work, by animal or mechanical power, all or any of the existing tramways within the city boundary (also to construct and work new tramways, etc.)."

Whereupon the tramway company promptly opened negotiations and offered, in case the city would leave the tramways in its hands and help it get the bill through Parliament to permit it to change its motive power to electric traction—

First. To pay a license fee of $2,500 a year for each mile of tramway now existing or hereafter to be constructed.

Second. To charge no higher fare than 1 penny from any city terminus to the city boundary, and not more than 2 pence for any fare within the city.

Third. In case any new or improved method of electric traction be discovered, to introduce it on the principal (designated) streets, if the city so requested.

Fourth. To give the city the option in 1928, or at the expiry of each seven years thereafter, to take its plant at a valuation.

Which proposition is still open.

Halifax: Every other department is here managed by the corporation for the benefit of the citizen. The gas works, waterworks, electric light, sanitary department, street cleaning, borough hospital, are all in the hands of the corporation, who do not seek to make a profit out of these undertakings, but simply to do the best they can for the benefit of the people. We are at present engaged in putting down an electrical system of tramways on the overhead trolley-wire system. The power is to be supplied from the existing corporation electricity works. The streets along the route will be lighted by electricity, the arc lamp being combined with the trolley poles. We are able to borrow money at 2½ per cent, and our only object will be to pay the interest on the capital and sinking fund and the working expenses, and get the best accommodation we possibly can at the lowest rate for the benefit of our citizens.

That is what we ought to do here, Mr. President. We have taken possession of the waterworks of Washington. They are owned and operated by the public. If they are not in every respect satisfactory, it is the public's fault; perhaps the fault of Congress, for we are the city council for Washington. One thing is certain—the rates are cheaper than in almost any other city in the land. We ought to take possession of the other public franchises. This city ought to operate its own electrical plant. What is the experience of cities in this connection? The gas plant of Belfast, with 210,000 people, is owned by the city and gas is sold at 60 cents a thousand. We pay $1.10 or $1.15 for what is not gas and what will not illuminate. The total receipts in Belfast were $883,000 and the net revenue $327,000, with 60-cent gas. The actual cost of the gas in the holder was 19.58 cents.

The same thing can be said in regard to electric light. An investigation has been made by which it is shown that in the United States cities which have their own electric plants pay less than one-half for the use of the light for lighting the city per lamp that cities in the United States pay which contract with private corporations.

The American League of Municipal Corporations reports that the cost of each street arc lamp in 25 American cities which own their plants and operate them is on the average $41 per year per lamp, while in 56 cities which contract for light it is $95.50, or two and a half times more.

Professor Bemis, of the Kansas Agricultural College, in the March Forum quotes the superintendent of the best of the three gas plants heretofore owned by the city of Philadelphia manufacturing gas as saying that it cost 27 cents per thousand feet. The price of gas in Manchester, England, is 53 cents per thousand, in Birmingham to the consumer 53 cents per thousand, in Glasgow, Scotland, 53 cents, and yet in this city we are paying more than double, almost two and one-half times, for this service, and it can not be said to be a better service, for no more wretched service was ever furnished any community than the Washington Gaslight Company furnishes to the capital city of the United States.

I desire to say but a few words more, and that is in regard to the amendment I have offered. I am sorry I have not had the time, or perhaps the inclination, to more thoroughly go into this question and more connectedly discuss it. The amendment which I have offered provides:

That at any time after five years from the date of the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or the Government of the United States, may acquire all the property of said company, by purchase or otherwise, for its actual value at the time the same is so acquired, without taking into account the value of any franchise now or heretofore granted, and may operate the same in the interest of the public, and the rights and privileges hereby granted shall be for a period of not to exceed twenty years, unless previously purchased as herein provided.

I do not like the charter. I think the bill itself is decidedly defective in that it allows the company to purchase the interests of any other companies in this city and issue unlimited stock. After this is disposed of I shall try to amend the bill so as to change it in that particular.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota, before he takes his seat, if the company is to pay the city anything for the valuable franchise under this charter?

Mr. McMILLAN. I will answer the Senator from North Carolina, if the Senator from South Dakota will allow me.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. The tax last year was $95,000.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not speaking of taxes. I want to know if they pay the city anything for the valuable franchise granted.

Mr. McMILLAN. No.

Mr. BUTLER. They simply pay taxes, like I would pay on my private property, or the Senator on his.

Mr. McMILLAN. They pay on private property, and also a tax on gross earnings.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, certainly; but they get the valuable franchise free. To put a small tax on their gross earnings is nothing. The Finance Committee is now considering the question of putting a small tax on the gross earnings of all corporations to raise more revenue.

This seems to be a very reasonable amendment. We give them for nothing a valuable franchise. If we buy back the property, surely we should not pay for the franchise which we have given and charged nothing for. If we give them the benefit of this valuable franchise, on which they can earn dividends for five years, certainly we should not pay them anything to get back the franchise at the end of five years. Give me the use of something very valuable for five years and I make big profits out of it for five years, and then at the end of that time give me the power to charge what I see fit for the franchise, and I will fix the price at a very high figure. What, we grant a valuable franchise for nothing and then can not take it back when we desire is the most monstrous proposition from a business standpoint I have ever heard.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator from North Carolina is through, I should like to make a remark.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from North Carolina is not through.

Mr. STEWART. Proceed then.

Mr. BUTLER. I paused when I saw the Senator rise, because I thought that the Senator from Nevada had risen to elucidate that astounding business proposition.

Mr. STEWART. I can elucidate this bill in five words if the Senator wants me to.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator may put five words into my speech if he will be that brief.

Mr. STEWART. The situation is simply this: Here are several roads which are bankrupt, to the great inconvenience of the people. There is a good deal said about benefiting the people. The people all around in that section of country are petitioning to have something done. They are going afoot and in every other way they can. That section of the city where these roads are is falling behind. It is not fair. They have not transportation facilities. With all the privileges the roads have had they can do nothing. Now, they propose to get together and form such a combination as will make it possible that they can build roads and give the city accommodations.

Now, as to the other roads in the city, I have this to say: The fares are very cheap. You can travel here 8 or 10 miles for 4½ cents, six tickets for a quarter. You can travel 10 miles on some of the lines. It is pretty cheap. Perhaps it is dear and perhaps it is not. Where the roads here have had proper legislation, they are giving the best service of any city in the United States. Everybody who comes here speaks with great admiration of these roads which have had proper legislation, and the stock of those roads does not exceed the money actually put in. Take the Capital Traction Company, about which there is so much said. There were $9,000,000 put in and they have capitalized the road at $12,000,000. The stock has been selling at from 55 to 70 cents on the dollar.

Mr. BUTLER. This is because the stock has been watered.

Mr. STEWART. The additional cost, by reason of putting in the new system, is going to bring it up almost dollar for dollar of the capitalization. There is no difficulty about that at all. It is perfectly understood, and in this city the people understand perfectly well what these roads are, and if the stock is put out it will not sell for any more than it will pay dividends on. We want to revive this part of the city and there is this scheme proposed. Anything less than the pending bill contains will not be effective and the city will not have roads. Imposing on these poor roads, which have been unable to exist, unable to give accommodations, conditions which will keep the localities deprived of railroad facilities, it seems to me is very bad. If we do that, it looks like tearing down the system.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if it is possible to have a piece of property that will be paying 20 per cent profit on its actual value, and then to increase its stock to such an amount that it would not pay any dividends at all, and yet the public will be charged the same tax for the same service that was charged when the property was paying a 20 per cent profit on the real value? We all know that the stock of nearly every corporation is thus increased to keep the public from knowing how much too high rates are, and also that some stock may be given to certain legislators and newspapers to keep them quiet.

Mr. STEWART. That is an imaginary case. That has not occurred in this city.

Mr. BUTLER. This imaginary case is one so near to the actual condition in so many places that it is uncomfortable to talk about it, I know. If it would not be possible to increase the stock and distribute it around until no profit could be distributed on account of the large amount——

Mr. STEWART. If ever it becomes possible for them to make a dividend on these roads by bringing them up, I shall be very glad. If they do that, they will give good service to the community. I want to have legislation for that purpose. To try all sorts of crude experiments on these roads when it is an absolute necessity that they shall be revived for the interest of the community seems unnecessary. Then, besides, Congress has power to regulate the fares. Congress can regulate these fares at any time, and it has kept them down within a reasonable limit at all times. Congress has power to impose taxation. There is no danger of any monopoly growing up or the community being injured if these roads are put in a condition where they can be improved and the community accommodated.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, it is true that we say we reserve the power to regulate rates; but we all know that whenever we grant such tremendous power and such important franchises to a private monopoly, they are soon able to negative the power that we have. They are soon able to persuade us not to regulate them.

Mr. President, to-day Congress, or the States, or the municipalities have the power to regulate every corporation, monopoly, and syndicate in the United States, and yet we regulate none. On the other hand, the monopolies regulate the city, the State, and the nation. I can not say that the monopolies are so much to blame. I suppose we would do the same thing under the same circumstances. But I complain of the system. I complain of the system which makes this possible and inevitable. It is our duty as legislators, if we can—if we are still able—to change the system.

The question whether such public services as lighting by gas or electricity, street-car transportation, and the furnishing of water to every household should be intrusted to private corporations or controlled directly by the municipalities is one that is attracting a great deal of attention. The principle of municipal ownership of these natural monopolies is one that is steadily growing in favor in every quarter of the Union. To have pure water furnished at a low cost; to have an efficient and cheap telephone service; to have good gas or electric lighting facilities furnished at reasonable rates and extended to every quarter of the city; to have prompt and efficient street-car service at a cost not greater than it costs to furnish the service, are four questions that concern every resident of a town or city as vitally as any other four questions pertaining to city government, if not more so.

To have these important services cheap and efficient is not only of vital concern to those who live in a city, but is the best possible advertisement and inducement to bring desirable additions to a city's population and business enterprises. That these important functions, supplying vital necessities to a city's welfare, should be put in the hands of two or three private monopolies, often foreign capitalists, who will use these monopolies with a view solely to their own profit, is unbusinesslike, to say the least—it is worse than that; it is folly, it is suicidal. As a rule, the cost of these necessities can be reduced upon an average more than one-half over the entire country, and each city furnish the people a better and more reliable service.

Nearly every city to-day where private monopolies hold these important functions and franchises would change at once to municipal ownership if a majority of the citizens could express their will and have it enforced. The fatal mistake is made when a city grants these franchises to a private monopoly. At once the monopoly wrings from the public enormous profits, and then uses a part of its profits to control the city elections and city government. Soon the people find that they can not elect any man for mayor, councilman, or alderman unless he is a man too friendly to the interests of these private monopolies. The monopolies will proceed to rule the cities; the voice of the people will be defeated, if not drowned and hushed.

On one occasion when I was in New York I was very much impressed with the inefficiency of the car service of that great metropolis. I asked a citizen of the city why there was no electric or cable street-car lines instead of here and there an antiquated horse-car line to help the elevated roads to move the great surging mass of humanity to be seen in that city every day. He pointed to the elevated railroads and said: "They will not allow it." I then asked him, if cable and electric companies had built surface roads and gotten established first, if they would have allowed others to build elevated roads. He said, "No. If the cable and electric road had been built and they had grown strong enough to control the city government, then we would have no elevated roads. They would not desire any competition and would want all the business themselves, and what of the public they could not accommodate might suffer and walk and go unaccommodated."

This tells the whole story. A city foolishly grants an important public franchise that concerns every citizen to a private corporation. The franchise is a monopoly, and then the corporation becomes a monopoly and uses the franchise not for the public interest except as the interest of the public can be served to put money into the pockets of the private corporations. Of course the private corporation uses its monopoly to make immense profits and then uses these profits to control the city elections and city government; and thus we have the spectacle of street railroads, gas and electric plants, telephone companies, and waterworks running the city in the interest of the private owners of the public franchises instead of the city running these important functions in the interest of the city and its citizens.

There is but one remedy to give the people justice and to purify politics, and that is for the city to own and operate these public franchises. Surely, if reason, common sense, and common business principles are to be observed, soon these reforms must come in every city. Thus it will be seen that the principles of the People's Party apply to the welfare and interests not only of the farmers and country population, but apply also equally strong to the welfare and interest of the residents of our towns and great cities. In short, the principles of the People's Party must be applied to insure the people good government in the nation, in the State, and in every local and city municipality in the nation. The people will suffer until it comes.

Mr. President, the amendment to this street railway charter will not cure the evil. It does not reach the root of the evil, but it is in the right direction. I trust that it will be adopted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will not weary the Senate with any special discussion of the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], and yet I think it incumbent upon me to say a word in opposition to that amendment and in advocacy of the bill.

Mr. President, I have sometimes been called an opponent of the existing street railway corporations of Washington because of certain action that I have taken in the committee room, but I am in no proper sense either an opponent or an advocate of these corporations. I simply want that they shall be dealt with fairly by Congress. That is all. The amount of labor imposed upon the Committee on the District of Columbia in legislating for this great District and for this great capital city is perhaps not known to Congress. In the matter of these street railway franchises a subcommittee, of which I have not been a member, has dealt with them and has given a great deal of time and attention to the questions involved. I look with a good deal of concern upon any action that may be contemplated that will embarrass these corporations at the present moment.

Mr. President, we have in the city of Washington three of the best street railways that in my judgment exist in any part of the world. We have the Capital Traction Company, which has spent in the construction of its line an enormous amount of money. I do not know how much it has spent, nor do I know the exact capitalization of that company. I do know, Mr. President, that that company, at the behest of Congress, abandoned the old, antiquated system of horse propulsion, put in a cable system that cost it an immense amount of money, lost its power house by fire, and is now proceeding to put in the latest known appliance for propelling street railroad cars, namely, the underground electric system.

We have the Metropolitan Company, which has been a matter of concern to the Congress of the United States for a great many years. For a time it was an unfortunate company. It had the horse railroad system in the first place. It then experimented at an immense expense with a storage-battery system, which proved a total failure. It then proceeded to put in what I have several times declared to be the best underground system that is known to any city of the civilized world. What amount of money that company expended, I do not know, but it certainly reaches into the millions, and that company has given to the citizens of Washington accommodations such as I have not found in any other city on the American continent.

We have on New York avenue another railroad that has never, as I remember, given Congress much trouble, a railroad that proceeded upon its own volition to put in a cable system as good as there is in any city in the United States or in any country in the world. That company is known as the Columbia Railroad Company.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire suspend for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 4545) to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President——

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will allow us to finish the pending bill. It is almost ready for a vote.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] who has charge of the unfinished business is not at this moment in his seat, and I do not think any arrangement can be made about the disposition of the bill until he comes in.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New Hampshire may be permitted to finish his remarks and then the matter can be determined.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will take but a moment.

Mr. KYLE. I agree to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, at the present time the Capital Traction Company is engaged in the enterprise of installing its plant with an underground electric system, and that company, at the command of Congress, is likewise to extend its line in several directions so as to give the citizens of this city increased railroad facilities. I think, in view of the fact that that corporation has expended so much money in first putting in a cable system and now putting in an underground electric system, in the loss of its immense power plant by fire, and in its purpose to obey the behest of Congress to extend its line in directions that will subserve the public interest, this is an inopportune time to legislate in any manner hostile to the interests of the corporation.

The present bill relates to certain other corporations in the city of Washington, to wit, to the Belt Line, to the Eckington and Soldiers' Home line, and to the line that is proposed to connect the city of Washington with the city of Baltimore. The Belt Line, as I understand the matter, and it has been a matter that has been frequently before the Committee on the District of Columbia, has never been a success. The money that has been invested in that corporation has been practically lost, and what is true of that corporation is likewise true of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home line. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] has stated today that some $3,000,000 has already been swallowed up in the enterprise that contemplates connecting the city of Washington with the city of Baltimore through the instrumentality of an electric railroad.

A great deal of complaint, and just complaint, has been made on the part of citizens residing in portions of the city through which these poor, inadequate, and practically bankrupt railroad companies run their roads. The people of Eckington have especially been full of complaints and protests, and even indignation meetings, as I remember, have been held to protest against the facilities that are given to them to reach the beautiful suburb of Eckington where they reside. The Committee on the District of Columbia has been diligent in investigating all these matters, and I speak for the subcommittee when I say that they deserve the commendation rather than the censure of the Senate for the time and patience which they have given to the subject.

The present bill proposes, as I understand it, to consolidate the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railroad, the Belt Line, and the line, whatever it may be called, that connects Washington with the city of Baltimore, and the design is, if this legislation goes through, that the combined corporation will install an electric plant that will be equal in efficiency and completeness to those already existing in the compact part of the city.

Now, Mr. President, to accomplish this great result money must be raised, capitalists must be appealed to, bonds must be sold; and I submit again that it is an inopportune time to load down this new enterprise with hostile legislation when they have to go into the markets of the world to raise the money to carry out this enterprise, which Congress says ought to be done, and for which the people of this city are clamoring.

Mr. President, this matter is in the hands of Congress. Every franchise that has been granted or that may be granted to a corporation of any kind can be amended or repealed at the wish of the Congress of the United States. It seems to me that that is an adequate remedy, and that we ought not to go beyond that at the present moment. If after these railroads get in working order, if after the Capital Traction Company has completed its line and this new line has accomplished its purpose, it is found that their rates are greater than they ought to be, Congress can amend the statutes so as to require them to pay taxes into the public Treasury that will be fair as between the public interests and the interests of the men who have invested their money in these great corporations, or Congress can reduce the rate which they charge for their service.

Mr. President, I do not care to go into a discussion of the other corporations of the District of Columbia. Very likely we have been too generous in dealing with corporate interests, but I do not think that the Senator from South Dakota is warranted when he arraigns the Washington Gaslight Company as being the worst managed company in the world and as furnishing the poorest gas at the highest price of any city in the country. We have legislated concerning that company. The Committee on the District of Columbia has given hours and days and weeks to careful consideration of the questions involved as between the people on the one hand and the capitalists who have invested their money in that corporation on the other.

Two years ago, or possibly three years ago, we legislated, settling that question for five years. We were then paying $1.25 a thousand for gas in the city of Washington, and we passed a bill providing that the amount should be reduced 5 cents a year for five years, so that at the end of five years we would have dollar gas in this District. The reduction has gone on from year to year until the people are now receiving gas at $1.10 a thousand (not $1.15, as the Senator from South Dakota stated it), and in two years more the gas will be furnished them for $1 per thousand.

Now, Mr. President, that is much cheaper than gas is furnished in almost any other city in the American Union. There are a few cities that furnish dollar gas; there may be one or possibly two cities that furnish gas for less than that amount; but I go back to my own home, where nobody has charged that the gas company is receiving extravagant returns for the money invested, and I find that we pay there $1.50 a thousand for gas, while in the city of Washington it is furnished to-day at $1.10, and in two years it will be furnished for $1 per thousand.

As to the quality of the gas, I know it is fashionable to say here and perhaps elsewhere that the gas furnished to the people of Washington is the poorest gas that is furnished to any people on the face of the earth. But, Mr. President, investigations have not shown that to be true. When we were legislating on this subject I called to my aid a gentleman who is an expert in this matter, but who was not then connected with any gas company in the country. He came here and carefully examined this gas. He examined it with great care, and he told me on his honor that the gas furnished to the citizens of Washington—that was some three years ago—was equal in quality to any gas of which he had knowledge. The corporation may have deteriorated the gas since then, but I do not believe they have done so. The gentlemen who are at the head of that corporation are enterprising, public-spirited citizens, who have put their money in that great corporation, and who are entitled to fair treatment on the part of the Congress of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, this is all I care to say. This matter has been gone over again and again, and it is like thrashing old straw to talk about the Government ownership of railroads, gas companies, telephone companies, and all that sort of thing. When the time comes for the serious discussion of that question, I shall be prepared to discuss it in my halting way, but it strikes me that that question is not involved in the matter as to whether we should pass the bill that is now before the Senate or the other bill that will come before the Senate relating to another railroad corporation in this District.

Let us deal fairly with this subject. Let us also hold all corporations to a strict accountability under the statutes; and if we find upon investigation that they are not dealing fairly with the people, let us amend the law; but at this time, when they are so solicitous to complete these great public improvements, and when we are all so solicitous to have them completed, do not let us, by the adoption of an amendment such as has never been attached to any bill of a similar nature, hamper them to an extent that will very likely prevent the consummation of the wish that the people and Congress both have at heart.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope we may now have a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to inquire whether we are going to complete these bills now or to take up another subject?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair laid before the Senate a moment since, in the absence of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], the unfinished business of the afternoon, being Senate bill 4545. That should be disposed of in connection with the request of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CARTER. The Committee on the Census is prepared to proceed with the consideration of the census bill, which is the unfinished business.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I have asked the Senator from Montana to lay aside his bill for the afternoon, and I think he has very courteously agreed to do so, provided we can finish the labor arbitration bill this afternoon.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to suggest for the consideration of the Senate at this time that it has become very obvious that the census bill must be pressed persistently in order to secure its passage through both Houses of Congress at the present session. That it should become a law in whatsoever form Congress will finally determine to pass it at the present session is very apparent to those who have considered the difficulties that have been encountered by census directors and those charged with the administration of census work in former years through the brief space of time allowed for preparatory work.

I have no desire whatever to antagonize the bill presented by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], and do not wish to be understood as attempting to place any obstacle in the way of its consideration. I had rather facilitate its consideration and passage; but, Mr. President, under existing circumstances, considering the sense of duty on the part of the members of the Committee on the Census and the pressure that has been justly brought to bear in order to secure early action upon that subject, I can not consent to the consideration of the bill presented by the Senator from South Dakota beyond this day. I consent that the census bill may be temporarily laid aside, but with the understanding that if the bill presented by the Senator from South Dakota leads to debate that extends beyond this day's session, the census bill can not be further laid aside for its consideration.

Mr. KYLE. I will state to the Senator from Montana that the amendments to be offered by different Senators in the Chamber have nearly all been presented to me, and they have also been presented to the members of the Railway Trainmen's Association, and there is a mutual agreement as to all these matters. I think that one hour will complete the bill if we can now proceed to its consideration.

Mr. McMILLAN. I give notice that to-morrow morning after the morning business I shall move to take up the street railroad bills.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, before this preliminary matter to which the Senator from Montana refers is settled, I think it is well to refer briefly to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Yesterday the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] said:

> For the past two days I have endeavored to get unanimous consent—in fact, I had already gotten it—for the consideration of Senate bill 3622. In deference to the wishes of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who wishes to propose certain amendments, I should like to have it go over until to-morrow at 2 o'clock. Therefore I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that we agree to consider the bill at that time.

Then, after some running discussion, the Vice-President said:

> Is unanimous consent given that Senate bill 3622 may be made the special order for to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock?

How, under those circumstances, is the Senator from Montana going to limit the debate on this bill?

Mr. CARTER. I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to a portion of the conversation recorded, which modifies the view of the Senator from Nebraska very materially. The Senator from Montana at that time suggested that it must be understood that this special order would in no sense interfere with the unfinished business of the Senate, and the Senator from Wisconsin suggested that certainly it would not interfere with the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I stated—which I understood to be the fact—that under the rule a special order does not displace the unfinished business; that the unfinished business at that time was the quarantine bill; and I understand that this morning shortly after the Senate was convened—I was not here—the quarantine bill was displaced and the census bill was made the unfinished business.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, granting all that to be true——

Mr. CARTER. The census bill has been pending as the second order of unfinished business. The first bill on that order was the quarantine bill.

Mr. SPOONER. How many orders of unfinished business does the Senator understand can be pending at the same time?

Mr. CARTER. I do not know, except that in the manner in which the Calendar is prepared it appears that the quarantine bill was the first on the order entitled "Unfinished business," and the census bill was the second in number under that head.

Mr. ALLEN. The statement I make may be premature at this time, but I want to be distinctly understood, as one member of the Senate, that I will not be bound by the construction the Senator from Montana gives to the unanimous-consent agreement of yesterday, and I do not accept the interpretation of it now offered.

Mr. CARTER. According to the statement made by the Senator from Nebraska, and according to the plain statement contained in the RECORD, unanimous consent was given only that the bill presented by the Senator from South Dakota should be made a special order; and the only question remaining is whether the unanimous consent to make a certain bill a special order of necessity displaces the unfinished business of the Senate. There can be no dispute about that; it is a matter of the construction of the rule.

Mr. ALLEN. In the language of an acquaintance of mine, that is the opinion of one man only.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly; but shared in by many others, I believe.

Mr. ALLEN. When a unanimous-consent agreement is entered into that a bill shall be taken up at a certain time and considered, where is there anything in the rules or practice of the Senate that displaces that order of business until it is determined?

Mr. CARTER. There is a difference, I will suggest to the Senator from Nebraska, between unanimous consent to take up a bill for consideration at a given time and the fixing of a certain bill as a special order.

Mr. KYLE. Allow me to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to what appears on page 4773 of the RECORD containing the proceedings of last evening as to the order of business:

Mr. CARTER. I suggest to the Senator from South Dakota to so modify his request that the unfinished business may at that time be informally laid aside, as it is not desired that this bill shall displace the unfinished business.
Mr. SPOONER. A special order does not displace the unfinished business.
Mr. KYLE. Of course we understand that the unfinished business takes precedence.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is made a special order, subject, of course, to the unfinished business.

That was the agreement last night, and I should now like to call up Senate bill 3662.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the unfinished business be informally laid aside for the day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to informally laying aside the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 4545) to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses? The Chair hears no objection, and the special order is now before the Senate, under the arrangement of yesterday, being Senate bill 3662.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I wish the consent of the Senate to modify the suggestion. Of course the census bill is to be laid aside for the day, so that it may be understood that it is to be taken up immediately after the conclusion of the pending bill, which it is understood will be disposed of to-day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9008) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LOUD, Mr. SMITH of Illinois, and Mr. SWANSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3132) to provide for the disposition of abandoned imported merchandise.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House to print 3,500 additional copies of the Second Special Report of the Commissioner of Labor.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 1586) to abolish the distinction between offered and unoffered lands, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 4142) to provide a life-saving station on the westerly side of the harbor of Gloucester, Mass.;

A bill (H. R. 6161) for the protection of fish in the District of Columbia, for the maintenance of a permanent spawning ground in the Potomac River in said District, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 214) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to rent lighting apparatus for Government building at Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the message from the House of Representatives returning the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9008) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and grant the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. QUAY, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. FAULKNER were appointed.

ARBITRATION BETWEEN RAILROAD COMPANIES AND EMPLOYEES.

Mr. KYLE. The House of Representatives has passed a bill in exactly the same form as the bill pending before the Senate; but I will state that I have in my hand a number of amendments proposed by different Senators, which I will offer in their order.

I find, however, on examining the House bill that the lines are numbered differently from the Senate bill. I have the amendments arranged according to the lines in the Senate bill. I will therefore ask that the Senate bill be taken up for consideration, and after it shall have been amended I will move to take up the House bill and then ask to have the Senate bill substituted for it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3662) concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees.

Mr. KYLE. I move to amend the bill in section 1, on page 2, line 14, after the word "act," by inserting "shall not be held to apply to employees of street railroads, and."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, on page 2, line 14, after the word "act," it is proposed to insert "shall not be held to apply to employees of street railroads, and;" so as to read:

That this act shall not be held to apply to employees of street railroads, and shall apply only to employees engaged in railroad train service, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. In the same section, on page 2, line 15, after the word "service," I move to strike out "and shall not be held to apply to employees of street railroads." I will state that that is merely a transposition of the sentence.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks on this bill, and I might as well do so at this time as at any other.

Mr. KYLE. I hope the Senator will desist until I can offer the amendments in their order.

Mr. ALLEN. My remarks will not at all interfere with the formal amendments the Senator from South Dakota desires to offer, but will be of a general character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. My connection with this matter began yesterday. I quote from the RECORD:

Mr. KYLE. I now ask that the bill (S. 3662) concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees be considered.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill referred to was made a special order for Monday, May 9, at 2 o'clock p. m.
* * * * * * *
Mr. KYLE. The bill to which I referred was made the special order for yesterday, and I understood yesterday that when we concluded the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill it would immediately follow the consideration of that bill, and there was unanimous consent to that arrangement.
Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to put myself in antagonism to the request of the Senator from South Dakota, and shall not do so; but I trust he will permit the bill to pass over until to-morrow. It is a bill of very great importance, but it is very artfully and skillfully drawn; and it is not, in my judgment, going to accomplish what the Senator expects or to accomplish what its friends expect it to accomplish. I have read it with a good deal of care. I have read it in the light of how I think courts will construe it, and I regard it as one of the most dangerous bills that has ever come before Congress. I desire to offer some amendments to it, however, and am not prepared at this time to do so. I do not want to antagonize the bill.

But the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] seemed to persist in its consideration at that time, and the Vice-President said:

Is there unanimous consent given for the consideration of the bill?

And I was constrained to say that I objected to its being considered at that time.

I make this statement for the purpose of another observation. Some person during the night, having construed my objection into opposition to the bill, telegraphed to Nebraska to labor organizations to telegraph me to support the bill, and I have been flooded this morning with telegrams to that effect. Of course I have little to say about that method of transacting business. With my natural disposition, if I had been inclined to be indifferent to the bill, I should oppose it rather than support it under the circumstances, but I want to renew the assertion that in my judgment this is one of the most vicious bills in the manner in which it is drawn that ever came before Congress. When I say "vicious," I do not mean it in the sense the word is sometimes used. I mean it in the sense of the consequences that are to flow from it if it becomes a law; and I propose to take a few moments in analyzing it, not very carefully but generally, and in pointing out, if I can, to the laboring people, especially to the railway men, whose friend I have always been and by whom I have always stood through good as well as through evil report, that they are being led into a trap by the passage of this bill, which means to them involuntary servitude.

I can understand very well how a gentleman like my friend the Senator from South Dakota can be in favor of a measure of this kind. Its title is pacific; its tone is pacific; but it is Janus-faced in fact. While it professes to be a bill for the arbitration of difficulties between the railroads and their employees, it is a bill which binds the railroad employees hand and foot and makes them, whether they will or not, the absolute bond servants of the employer. I will endeavor to have it amended as far as I can, and then, if the representatives of the labor organizations who are in these galleries at the present moment, after hearing the analysis that will be made by myself and others, still persist that they want it, I am inclined to think, so far as my vote goes, I will give it.

I will examine the bill section by section, not with any expectation or desire to consume time, but for the purpose of pointing out in a general way some of its defects. The bill is entitled "A bill concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees." As a matter of fact, although not appearing upon its face to be such, it is amendatory of the present interstate-commerce act. If passed, it will become a statute upon that subject, and must be construed in pari materia with that act and all other acts upon the subject of interstate commerce. The first section is as follows:

That the provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers and their officers, agents, and employees, except masters of vessels and seamen as defined in section 4612, Revised Statutes of the United States, engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, for a continuous carriage or shipment, from one State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States.

I read that section for the purpose of showing that it has reference wholly to interstate commerce; and that becomes an important matter to be borne in mind as we proceed with the examination of this bill.

Now I pass to this language on pages 2 and 3, which I will read:

The wages paid by carriers subject to this act for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation aforesaid—

That refers to interstate transportation—or in connection therewith, or for the receiving, delivering, storage, and handling of such property, and the rules and regulations governing such employees shall be reasonable and just.

Here is a defect in the bill. It may be said to be a minor defect; but let me ask the honorable Senator who is in charge of the measure what are reasonable and just wages and who is to determine the question?

Mr. KYLE. I will state that there is an amendment which I was going to offer, to strike out the clause beginning in line 25, at the bottom of page 2, and going to line 7, on page 3.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope that will be done; but we were informed yesterday and again to-day that the bill has run the gamut of the House of Representatives and the Senate on one or more occasions, and yet the very first line shows the skillful hand of the man who drafted it: "They shall be reasonable and just." That is a general declaration. What is reasonable and just compensation? It is dependent on the circumstances. And who is to determine whether the compensation is reasonable and just? The railroads. And when they determine that, there is power given the courts to enforce it against the man who is employed, and to retain him in their employment. Then it says:

This provision shall not affect the right to make contracts for such wages not in contravention of any of the provisions of this act.

What does that mean, except that so far as the provisions of the bill are concerned you can not make a contract in violation of its terms?

This provision shall not affect the right to make contracts for such wages not in contravention of the provisions of this act.

Outside of the provisions of the bill, of course, you may make a contract, but every conceivable contract that can be made by an employee with a railroad company is covered by it. Therefore you can not make a contract that will be enforced in any court of justice, State or Federal, in violation of the terms of the bill. Suppose we consider that a minor objection also.

SEC. 2. That whenever a controversy concerning wages, hours of labor, or conditions of employment shall arise between a carrier subject to this act and the employees of such carrier, seriously interrupting or threatening to interrupt the business of said carrier, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Commissioner of Labor shall, upon the request of either party to the controversy, with all practicable expedition, put themselves in communication with the parties to such controversy, and shall use their best efforts, by mediation and conciliation, to amicably settle the same; and if such efforts shall be unsuccessful, shall at once endeavor to bring about an arbitration of said controversy in accordance with the provisions of this act.

All of that is harmless except two lines. When are these arbitrators, or when are the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Commissioner of Labor, to tender their good offices to the contending parties? When the condition is such as to seriously interrupt or threaten to interrupt the business of the carrier. Who is to complain? The carrier alone can complain. They can not mediate or tender their good offices unless the conditions are such as to seriously interrupt the transaction of the employer's business.

Mr. President, suppose the conduct of the business is such as to seriously affect the welfare of the employee. These gentlemen are powerless under such circumstances to tender their good offices or to mediate. Whenever the railroad company says, "Our business is seriously menaced or interrupted," then and then only can the services of these gentlemen be called for or can they tender their good offices. But the transportation company may be squeezing the life out of the laborers, may be discharging them or reducing their wages or lengthening their hours, and under this section the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Commissioner of Labor are powerless to tender their good offices as arbitrators or mediators. But that may be said to be a trival matter also.

I go now to page 4, subdivision first of section 3. After speaking of the manner of the selection of arbitrators and providing for the ordinary written submission for arbitration, the bill reads:

First. That the board of arbitration shall commence their hearings within five days from the date of the appointment of the third arbitrator, and shall find and file their award, as provided in this section, within twenty days from the date of the appointment of the third arbitrator; and that pending the arbitration the status existing immediately prior to the dispute shall not be changed.

That reads very nicely. But suppose the arbitrators do not convene within the time fixed; suppose they absolutely decline or refuse to convene within that time; where is the power to compel them to convene, and when they do convene, to compel them to act? Mr. President, in one sense they are a quasi-judicial tribunal, and while it might be said that a court by writ of mandamus would compel them to convene and possibly to act, the court could not control the character of their action or the time within which their award is to be made.

What happens during all this time? All this time "pending the arbitration the status existing immediately prior to the dispute shall not be changed." That means, if there is a controversy between the railroad company and its employees and they have not quit the service of the company, they are bound under the terms of the bill to remain in the service of the company whether they want to or not: and I will show further along that the Federal court is given power to compel them to remain there. These arbitrators could hold the status quo for months, and the employees appealing for arbitration or for a settlement of the difficulty could be starved to death or their wages and conditions be fixed by the company; and back of all that would rest this perverted equity power to compel them to remain in the service of the company.

If that is not involuntary servitude, I should like to know what it is. Never was black man in the South owned by higher or better title than will be the employees of the railroad companies under the terms of this bill if it becomes a law.

The second subdivision of the same section reads as follows:

Second. That the award shall be filed in the clerk's office of the circuit court of the United States for any district wherein the employer carries on business, and shall be final and conclusive upon both parties, unless set aside for error of law apparent on the record.

It may be filed in any district court wherein the employer carries on his business. It is well known that at least one if not more transportation companies run from San Francisco to New York under certain traffic arrangements. Suppose the controversy arose in San Francisco and the arbitration took place there. Under the terms of the bill the award of the court could be filed in the circuit court of the United States for the district of New York; and if there was any attempt to controvert it, any motion made to set it aside, or bill filed to set it aside for fraud, the employee living in San Francisco would be compelled to go to New to make his motion or to file his bill, a distance of over 3,000 miles.

Mr. KYLE. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit, I will state that I have an amendment, in line 6, to strike out the words "where the employer carries on business" and insert "wherein the controversy arises or the arbitration is entered into."

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator, before he gets through, will find many holes which he will want to stop up. Further, Mr. President, it—

Shall be final and conclusive upon both parties, unless set aside for error of law apparent on the record.

Who ever heard of a law of that kind?

Shall be final and conclusive upon both parties, unless set aside for error of law apparent on the record.

There is not a provision requiring testimony to be preserved. There is nothing but the bare written record of submission and the award, and where is the lawyer who can point out the possibility of an error of law arising upon the face of the record on a mere ordinary contract of submission to arbitrate and the award of the arbitrators? Yet so this bill provides.

It means, Mr. President, in other words, that the award once made shall be conclusive, whether obtained by fraud, by coercion, by circumvention, or in any other unlawful way. Every lawyer understands very well that a submission to arbitration or the award itself, like all other contracts, in a court of equity is subject to be set aside for fraud in any of its various forms in its procurement, and yet here the parties are concluded from even raising the question of fraud, either by bills or motion or in any other way conformable to the practice of the courts. Suppose there was the grossest misrepresentation upon the part of one party or the other which induced the other to sign the contract of submission; suppose there was the most outrageous coercion, which is another form of fraud, either physical or moral coercion, this language, if it becomes a law, concludes the party from raising any question of that kind.

Mr. President, let us proceed with that idea apparent to the third subdivision of this section. Here is a little awkward phrase thrown in, but the courts will construe it properly.

That the respective parties to the award will each faithfully execute the same—

I suppose that means execute a bond to perform the award—

and that the same may be specifically enforced in equity so far as the powers of a court of equity permit.

There is the death trap in the bill. If you had a court of equity such as we had twenty years or more ago to enforce the bill, no one might have any cause to complain or to suspicion that anything would be wrong; but ever since Ricks, of Michigan, perverted the equity power of the Federal courts, which has been followed to the point of specifically enforcing contracts against individuals of a personal character, every employee ought to be guarded and careful in the contract which he signs, and Congress ought to be careful in the passage of its law. Does any man doubt that the Federal judiciary as now constituted, or a portion of it at least, where these controversies will arise, will hold that an injunction can issue to compel the employee specifically to perform a contract and observe the award? If not, why this language?

May be specifically enforced in equity so far as the powers of a court of equity permit.

It is said by the friends of the measure that that is all prevented by the next two lines:

No person shall, however, be punished for his failure to comply with the award as for contempt of court.

But suppose after the award has been made and judgment entered upon it, passing from a mere quasi-judicial proceeding into a full judicial proceeding, if that expression is permissible, and the court issues its writ of injunction upon bill filed for the enforcement of the judgment and the defendant violates the injunction, does any man doubt that he will be punished, notwithstanding this language?

If it read, "Provided, however, That no person shall be punished for a failure to comply with the writ of injunction issued for the specific performance of the contracts enumerated in this act," the situation would be entirely different; but here it provides for a specific performance of personal contracts to labor, by bill in equity, by injunction, leaving, of course, as it must, the power to punish for a failure to observe the injunction or for its violation.

No person shall, however, be punished for his failure to comply with the award as for contempt of court.

That might just as well be omitted, so far as having any force in the bill is concerned.

Fourth. That employees dissatisfied with the award shall not by reason of such dissatisfaction quit the service of the employer before the expiration of three months from and after the making of such award without giving thirty days' notice in writing of their intention so to quit. Nor shall the employer dissatisfied with such award dismiss any employee or employees on account of such dissatisfaction before the expiration of three months from and after the making of such award without giving thirty days' notice in writing of his intention so to discharge.

Fifth. That said award shall continue in force as between the parties thereto for the period of one year after the same shall go into practical operation, and no new arbitration upon the same subject between the same employer and the same class of employees shall be had until the expiration of said one year if the award is not set aside as provided in section 4.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. It is provided in the bill—I do not know who drew it, but it is very evident to me that many parts of it were not drawn by a skillful hand, as the Senator seems to think it was—that an award, when made and filed in the office of the circuit court of the United States—and I agree with the Senator that it ought to be filed in the district where the arbitration is conducted and where the award is made—shall have the effect and operation of a judgment——

Mr. ALLEN. It is a judgment.

Mr. SPOONER. The moment it is filed.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I suppose there must be a formal judgment entered upon it.

Mr. SPOONER. No matter; it is filed, and a judgment is entered upon it. Does not the Senator understand subdivision 3, relating to the enforcement of it, as referring to that award thus filed and which is declared to have the effect of a judgment?

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that to mean not only the enforcement of the award, but the enforcement of the status quo which is provided for.

Mr. SPOONER. The award is to be immediately filed.

Mr. ALLEN. I know.

Mr. SPOONER. And when filed is to have the effect of a judgment. Then comes this third subdivison.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

Mr. SPOONER. It says:

Third. That the respective parties to the award will each faithfully execute the same, and that the same may be specifically enforced in equity so far as the powers of a court of equity permit. No person shall, however, be punished for his failure to comply with the award as for contempt of court.

My understanding of that was that the last clause in it practically rendered that subdivision useless.

Mr. ALLEN. No.

Mr. SPOONER. Because in what manner can the court of equity specifically enforce an award except either by a mandatory or a restraining injunction?

Mr. ALLEN. That is all.

Mr. SPOONER. Very good.

Mr. ALLEN. But suppose——

Mr. SPOONER. That is all; and when the section provides, as it does provide, that no person shall be punished for a failure to comply with the award, as for contempt of court, what power does it leave the court to specifically enforce under equity practice that award or judgment?

Mr. ALLEN. But the Senator must remember that there are certain things which precede subdivision 3, to which he now refers.

Mr. SPOONER. But this section does not refer to those. It provides—

That the same may be—

That is, after it is filed in the clerk's office, but is given the effect of a judgment, and I am anxious to hear the discussion of the Senator—

That the same may be specifically enforced in equity so far as the powers of a court of equity permit.

But no resort shall be had to injunction.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator is in error. I have no doubt about it in my own mind. It is provided in the first subdivision of section 3 that pending arbitration the status quo shall be maintained.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. That is, the exact condition of the employer and the employee shall remain.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. That is, if the parties enter into an arbitration to adjust in the court of conciliation a difference as to wages, as to hours of labor, or any other controversy, while they are engaged in an arbitration, seeking an adjustment of it, the railway company shall not change the status by discharging the men, or by reducing or attempting to enforce any reduction that is made; and the men will not change the status.

Mr. ALLEN. Exactly so.

Mr. SPOONER. That is all. Now, while they are agreeing or attempting to agree upon an adjustment——

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose that pending the determination of the matters submitted to arbitrament the men or the company do undertake to change.

Mr. SPOONER. But this says they shall not.

Mr. ALLEN. I know; but suppose they do attempt it.

Mr. SPOONER. But they will have agreed here that they will not.

Mr. ALLEN. But suppose they undertake to violate their contract; what then? The court under the terms of this bill can step in and enjoin.

Mr. SPOONER. That is no part of the award.

Mr. ALLEN. But if the Senator will go further on in the bill, he will see that there are other provisions here.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, it is no part of the award.

Mr. ALLEN. I know it is not; but the courts have power under their modern construction to enforce the status quo by an injunction.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, yes; they have decided everything except that a man has a right to live.

Mr. NELSON. I want to remind the Senator from Wisconsin——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I am willing to get information from any source.

Mr. NELSON. I remind the Senator from Wisconsin of a case with which, of course, he is familiar, where Judge Jenkins, in Milwaukee, made his injunctional order. He absolutely forbade the men from leaving work.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly. There is no question about that.

Mr. NELSON. It was the first time in the history of this country that it was done.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not care to enter into a discussion of that case, although I am quite familiar with it. It was merely a question of construction. My own opinion was, reading the injunction as a whole, that it did not have that effect. If it would have that effect, as the circuit court of appeals held it did, no lawyer could sustain it.

Mr. ALLEN. That court went to the extent of holding that I can not go to my neighbor and reason with him about his quitting the employment of the company.

Mr. SPOONER. We struck that out.

Mr. ALLEN. You say they struck it out?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad they did, but they decided everything but that. I could not reason with him as one neighbor has a right to reason with another, I could not point out to him as one neighbor has a right to point out to another, that it is contrary to his interest to remain in the employment of the company, and I was subject to be brought before the court and fined and imprisoned for exercising my right of free speech.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know, as I stated before, who drew this bill. The only interest I had in it was when Mr. Clark, who was at the head of the conductors of the United States, who is a very able, frank, and fair man, asked me to look into it and if I thought it was right to do what I could to help it along. I am in favor of arbitration and the settlement of these disputes in that way if it can be done. I would myself be unwilling to vote for the bill if the Senator's construction of it is a correct one. If it is not perfectly clear by the bill, which I think it is, that the writ of injunction could not be used in the way suggested by the Senator, it ought to be made perfectly clear.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I was proceeding to say—but not technically, of course, as I would if the question were at the bar—that under the terms of this bill, pending the arbitration, the court has the power to issue an injunction to maintain the status quo, and therefore to imprison the laborer or to compel him to work contrary to his will. Whatever you may call it, whenever you take a man's will power away from him you make him a slave. But I will not dwell upon that point, and will pass to subdivision 5, which provides:

> That said award shall continue in force, as between the parties thereto, for the period of one year after the same shall go into practical operation, and no new arbitration upon the same subject between the same employer and the same class of employees shall be had until the expiration of said one year, if the award is not set aside as provided in section 4.

Now, you can set aside the award, according to section 4, for error upon the face of the record, and for no other reason.

Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin—and I address him because he is interested in this matter and has been kind enough to give me his attention——

Mr. SPOONER. I always do.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Wisconsin knows that it is absolutely impossible to raise a question of error upon the face of the record where you have nothing but the articles of submission and the award. There is no provision for a motion to set aside the award. There is no power in the court in which the award is filed to set it aside according to this bill. There is but one thing to do, and that is to enter a judgment upon the award and enforce it. I think possibly there is an appeal to the court of appeals.

Mr. SPOONER. It does not require any statutory authority to authorize a motion or an appeal to set aside an award for fraud or duress.

Mr. ALLEN. But if the statute says it shall be absolutely binding except for error appearing on the face of the record, then I want to know if the court has power by appeal or otherwise to assail it upon any other ground.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. That is ordinarily true of judgments; they are conclusive unless reversed by an appellate court; but you can set aside for fraud or duress or any of those grounds.

Mr. ALLEN. But you can not set aside a statutory adjustment.

Mr. SPOONER. You can set aside any statutory award for fraud or for duress.

Mr. ALLEN. If the statute says that you can not set it aside for fraud and says you can set it aside for one reason and for one reason only, you are bound by that reason, and the court will follow the statute.

Mr. SPOONER. All of that is that the appellate court may set it aside for error of law upon the record.

Mr. ALLEN. No.

Mr. SPOONER. That does not exclude at all the proceeding to set it aside for fraud or for duress.

Mr. ALLEN. The bill does not say that and it can not be so construed. I will go back to that portion of it although it will make my remarks more fragmentary than I intended them to be.

Subdivision second of section 3 provides:

> That the award shall be filed in the clerk's office of the circuit court of the United States for any district wherein the employer carries on business, and shall be final and conclusive upon both parties, unless set aside for error of law apparent on the record.

Does not that exclude fraud? Does it not exclude duress? Does it not exclude fraud in the form of misrepresentation or in any of its forms and are you not confined to the one question of error on the record, if this bill becomes a law?

Mr. President, I will not contend with the Senator from Wisconsin any longer upon that point. I have my view; he has his. We will probably never get any nearer together upon the question than we are now.

Now, let me go back again to subdivision 5, which I have quoted, to the effect that the award must continue in force, in practical operation, that no new arbitration shall be had for one year unless the award is set aside as provided in section 4, set aside for error appearing upon the face of the record. Mr. President, the Senator says there is not much art in this provision. If the bill is so drafted that you present simple articles of submission and an award without preserving evidence, either in the form of a bill of exceptions or in some other way, so you render it impossible to make error appear upon the record, and then you say the award is conclusive upon all parties, unless set aside for error upon the record, does not the Senator from Wisconsin know that that is an absolute travesty upon justice?

Mr. SPOONER. When I glanced hastily over the bill in the first instance I stated to the gentlemen who were talking to me about it, the representatives of the trainmen, that it needed amendment in that particular; that it seemed to me quite foolish to file simply the award itself and then talk about error in the record.

Mr. ALLEN. That is it.

Mr. SPOONER. Therefore there was prepared and will be offered, I suppose, at the proper time an amendment which is obviously necessary, as a good many others were necessary in the bill. That is why I thought it was not very skillfully drafted.

Mr. ALLEN. There is no provision for a new trial.

Mr. SPOONER. I refer to an amendment which shall provide for filing with the award, the arbitration agreement, all the evidence and proceedings in the matter.

Mr. ALLEN. I contend that it is skillfully drawn, from the very premises of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not properly drawn.

Mr. ALLEN. No; it is not drawn as a lawyer ought to draw an honest bill, or as an honest lawyer would draw an honest bill.

Mr. President, here are simply the articles of submission. Of course they are absolutely perfect on their face. Then there is the award. That is perfect on its face. Who can tell from the trial before the arbitrators or the proceedings before the arbitrators what testimony was taken or what evidence was introduced?

Mr. SPOONER. It all ought to be included.

Mr. ALLEN. But there is no provision for it, and there is the skill and art in the bill. There is no motion for a new trial before the arbitrators, no bill of exceptions, no certificate of evidence, nothing whatever to tell what took place before them. And then comes the other artful provision, that you can not attack it for fraud; you can not attack it for circumvention; you can not attack it for duress. You can attack it alone for error upon the face of the record, when there is no error there and it is made impossible to put it there.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not know who drafted the bill that is under discussion. I have been requested by a number of railroad employees' associations to give the bill my support, and I do so most earnestly. I have examined it with some little care and regard its main purpose as eminently proper and worthy of being enacted into law. I have discovered some errors, a few of which have been pointed out by the Senator from Nebraska, and a few will appear as the discussion proceeds. I have failed to observe that they——

Mr. ALLEN. What question did the Senator desire to put?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I wanted the Senator to point out if he would, as he proceeds, in whose interest these subtle and dangerous provisions to which he has referred have been prepared.

Mr. ALLEN. In whose interest?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. In whose interest.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If there are any ambiguous or improper provisions in this bill, I would like to have the Senator point out in whose behalf they have been inserted.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator from Indiana is in a better position to know that than I am.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I am not making any charge against the good faith of the authors of the bill or doubting the integrity of its provisions. It seems to me, if the Senator will permit me to say it, that the bill bears an honest purpose upon its face. The provisions here are mutual. They are to be enjoyed and observed alike by each party to the arbitration. I do not see how the Senator can charge either party interested in the bill with having designedly inserted any imperfect or unjust provisions.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Indiana sets up a straw man or a snow man, whatever it may be called, and knocks it down himself. I have made no charge against anybody. Perhaps it was a gnawing conscience or something of that kind or his imagination that induced the Senator to believe that I was making some charge.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. No. As I said to the Senator, I am unaware as to who prepared the bill or as to the object to be accomplished by it except as that object is disclosed upon its face.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am in the same situation. So the Senator has as much light upon that question as I have. But if I wanted to draw a bill to defeat the purpose expressed in its title, I could not in a month draw a better bill than this.

I was speaking on this question, and I want to pass from it as rapidly as possible because I do not want to consume the day. I am going to vote for the bill if the representatives of the labor organizations think it is a good bill after I get through with it. I am going to vote for it from the opening to the closing of it under such circumstances, because they are the men interested, but I want to point out, and I intend to point out, in my imperfect way, before I get through, these vital defects and pitfalls.

Mr. President, let me call attention, at the expense of repeating myself in consequence of these interruptions, to the fact that you can only attack it for error upon the face of the record. For all other purposes it is conclusive. It is conclusive, and there is no provision for preserving evidence. You can take testimony, but there is no provision for its preservation. There is no provision to set it aside on a motion for a new trial or a rehearing in any of their various forms.

Then what follows after the award has been filed and the judgment entered on it? Then follows the provision in subdivision 5 of section 3 that there shall be no new arbitration upon the subject-matter that was submitted to arbitrament in the first instance for one year, unless the award is set aside on the grounds provided for in section 4, when section 4 can not provide and does not provide a ground on which to set it aside. Therefore it is final.

Mr. President, suppose the question submitted to arbitrament be that the employees shall continue work for a year at specific wages at all times and under all conditions, leaving, as the bill does, the right in the hands of the employer to discharge them for incompetency and for a number of other excuses which can be resorted to if the employer wants to resort to them. Does any man doubt, if the bill should become a law, that a court of equity, as the writ of injunction is now employed, would not issue an injunction to specifically perform the award entered upon a submission of that kind? I do not know that I make my meaning plain, but I mean to say that this confers express power on the Federal court to issue an injunction based upon a bill to specifically perform an award of that kind, and when you open up the question once in this country that laborers can be driven to work as unwilling slaves by a writ of injunction for a year, you can open it up for two years or for a lifetime.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator what effect, if any, he gives to this provision:

> No person shall, however, be punished for his failure to comply with the award as for contempt of court.

Mr. ALLEN. I explained that. That is one of the artful provisions of the bill. Of course it is impossible in the matter of arbitration to issue an injunction or make an award which is self-operative in that respect; but suppose they find specifically by their award on this question submitted to them, and then the equity power of the court provided for in the bill is called into execution to enforce that award.

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. ALLEN. Now, wait a moment. Suppose it is called into use to execute that award and the laborer refuses to be bound by the injunction; can not the court arrest him and punish him, not for violating the award, but for violating the writ of injunction?

Mr. SPOONER. If there came any obligation out of the award that the Senator speaks of, the court is prohibited here from issuing any injunction or punishing the violation of the injunction or failure to abide by the award in any respect.

Mr. ALLEN. The court is not prohibited. I beg to differ with the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. That is my understanding.

Mr. ALLEN. The court is empowered by the bill to specifically enforce the personal contracts of the parties. It is all through the bill from its title to its end. Now, when they have submitted the question of the length of their contract to arbitrament and the arbitrators have found against them, the power is in the Federal court to specifically perform that contract by writ of injunction and to punish them if they violate the writ. These gentlemen have been, metaphorically speaking, taken by the back of the neck by the Federal courts of this country for ten years and shaken as a dog would shake rats, without mercy and without precedent.

Mr. President, I can not discuss the bill consecutively, and I do not propose to attempt it in the time I ought to properly consume. Section 4 provides:

> That the award being filed in the clerk's office of a circuit court of the United States, as hereinbefore provided, shall go into practical operation, and judgment shall be entered thereon accordingly at the expiration of ten days from such filing, unless within such ten days either party shall file exceptions thereto for matter of law apparent upon the record—

Here it is preserved again, for matter of law preserved upon the record—> in which case said award shall go into practical operation and judgment be entered accordingly when such exceptions shall have been finally disposed of either by said circuit court or on appeal therefrom.

It is made apparent in another provision that an error of law appearing upon the face of the record is the only ground upon which the award can be set aside.

> At the expiration of ten days from the decision of the circuit court upon exceptions taken to said award, as aforesaid, judgment shall be entered in accordance with said decision unless during said ten days either party shall appeal therefrom to the circuit court of appeals. In such case only such portion of the record shall be transmitted to the appellate court as is necessary to the proper understanding and consideration of the questions of law presented by said exceptions and to be decided.

Pending the writ of error or appeal, or whatever form the appellate proceedings may take—pending that, Mr. President, which you and I know is liable to consume a year or more, perhaps two or three years, what becomes of the relation between the employer and employee? Turn back to the subdivision 1 of section 3 and see:

> And that pending the arbitration the status existing immediately prior to the dispute shall not be changed.

Pending all that time the arbitration—and the appeal from the award is part of the arbitration in a strict legal sense—all during that time and during the appeal, lasting perhaps for a year or two, the status quo must continue and can be enforced by injunction. We know in these contests of litigation that time itself defeats the laboring man:

> The determination of said circuit court of appeals upon said questions shall be final, and, being certified by the clerk thereof to said circuit court, judgment pursuant thereto shall thereupon be entered by said circuit court.

Then section 5 provides for the taking of evidence, but there is no provision for its preservation or presentation to the appellate court.

Section 6 also provides that in certain cases the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Commissioner of Labor may decline to summon arbitrators or to appoint them.

Section 7 then provides:

> That during the pendency of arbitration under this act it shall not be lawful for the employer, party to such arbitration, to discharge the employees, parties thereto, except for inefficiency, violation of law, or neglect of duty; nor for the organization representing such employees to order, nor for the employees to unite in, aid, or abet strikes or boycotts against said employer; nor, during a period of three months after an award under such an arbitration, for such employer to discharge any such employees, except for the causes aforesaid, etc.

Mr. President, there is an inequality in this bill. Under its terms you can bind the laborer; you can bind him hand and foot and enforce his slavery by writ of injunction; but at the same time you leave the absolute power in the hands of the employer to discharge him without restraint. In other words, the employer says: "If you do not work for me at the wages agreed upon, or found by arbitrament, I will appeal to the court to issue a writ of injunction against you to force you to comply with your contract, or with the award, but I will reserve the right myself to discharge you for inefficiency or neglect of duty or violations of law."

Who, Mr. President, is to determine the question of inefficiency and neglect of duty? The employer. A man may be absolutely efficient and attentive to duty, and yet the employer, under this bill, can discharge him, and he is without remedy. But if the employer desires to retain him, and an award has been made settling that question, that award can be enforced by a court of equity through the agency of a writ of injunction.

There is a ray of daylight in this bill, and only a ray, to the man who works.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have not seen any.

Mr. ALLEN. It is only a ray. Why, Mr. President, I thought there was a ray of daylight in section 8, but my friend on my right [Mr. COCKRELL] is correct in saying he has not yet seen any.

Section 8 provides:

> That in every incorporation under the provisions of chapter 567 of the United States Statutes of 1885 and 1886 it must be provided in the articles of incorporation and in the constitution, rules, and by-laws that a member shall cease to be such by participating in or by instigating force or violence against persons or property during strikes, lockouts, or boycotts, or by seeking to prevent others from working through violence, threats, or intimidations. Members of such incorporations shall not be personally liable for the acts, debts, or obligations of the corporations.

Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that there is no man in this Chamber who condemns violations of law more strongly than I do. The laboring men of this country have got nothing to gain by violence, by lockouts, and by strikes. They must be the losers in every case of that kind, to say nothing of the criminality of violating rights of persons and of property and the law. The power of the laboring man in this country is his power to centralize and use his vote; it is the manhood suffrage that is in him; and yet this bill steps into the ranks of these organized men and says what their membership shall be.

Why, Mr. President, was there not included in this bill a provision that every man who waters the stocks of railroad companies and makes his millions and violates his oath and his duty as a citizen shall be punished? Why was not something thrown around the people to protect them against him and his kind? No, not one word, not one whisper, on that subject, but everything against the poor man, who has to earn his food day by day. The road owners can get together in the back parlor of some bank or broker's office; they can conspire among themselves to wring millions out of the laborers and the producers of the country, and they are called gentlemen and financiers; but if the poor men, who have not a house to live in or to meet in, meet in the street and manifest their contempt, they are a mob, a riot, it is said. So there is nothing for them.

Now we come to section 9, which provides:

That whenever receivers appointed by Federal courts are in the possession and control of railroads, the employees upon such railroads shall have the right to be heard in such courts upon all questions affecting the terms and conditions of their employment, through the officers and representatives of their associations, whether incorporated or unincorporated, and no reduction of wages shall be made by such receivers without the authority of the court therefor after due notice to such employees.

Mr. President, that is not necessary, because the Federal courts have already so held.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. That question has been held both ways.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; but the ablest judge of all held the way I have stated.

Mr. SPOONER. Judge Caldwell held that they could; but, on the other hand, the circuit judge of the United States in Massachusetts held that they could not, and the laboring men thought that ought to be authorized by statute.

Mr. ALLEN. I have known Judge Caldwell for thirty-three years or more. He is an honest man.

Section 10 provides:

That any employer subject to the provisions of this act and any officer, agent, or receiver of such employer who shall require any employee, or any person seeking employment, as a condition of such employment, to enter into an agreement, either written or verbal, not to become or remain a member of any labor corporation, association, or organization; or shall threaten any employee with loss of employment, or shall unjustly discriminate against any employee because of his membership in such a labor corporation, association, or organization; or who shall require any employee or any person seeking employment, as a condition of such employment, to enter into a contract whereby such employee or applicant for employment shall agree to contribute to any fund for charitable, social, or beneficial purposes; to release such employer from legal liability for any personal injury by reason of any benefit received from such fund beyond the proportion of the benefit arising from the employer's contribution to such fund; or who shall, after having discharged an employee, attempt or conspire to prevent such employee from obtaining employment, or who shall, after the quitting of an employee, attempt or conspire to prevent such employee from obtaining employment, is hereby declared to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in the district in which such offense was committed, shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000.

There is only one really good provision in this bill, and that is that the railroad companies shall not blacklist—I believe that is what they call it—labor organizations or laboring men; and do you know, Mr. President, that the laboring men have been made to believe that that is of some great benefit to them—that that is a right that did not exist before? It is in violation of the criminal statutes of the United States and of every State in the Union to blacklist a man. You not only can prosecute a man criminally for it if you can obtain the evidence—and that is the trouble, to obtain the evidence—you can not only indict him and try him and send him to the penitentiary for it, but you can sue him and obtain a judgment against him for damages. So you can indict an official of the railroad who blacklists his employee and punish him, if you have the court and can get the evidence, and you can obtain a judgment against him and against his company for damages for libel. This section does not add anything to the right. That right exists to-day.

But, Mr. President, you and I know that the companies will ride over it roughshod if it shall become a law. They have the power and the force, and they will use it regardless of what the statute says. Yet that is the only provision in this bill that really looks to the protection of the interests of these organizations or their associations. I thought there was a provision in the bill—possibly there is, and in my haste I may have overlooked it—that when the companies were sued in cases of personal injury to their employees, they should not be permitted to deduct from the damages any benefits received by the employee from the beneficiary associations. If such a provision is not in the bill, it ought to be; and possibly it is—I think it is, but I can not read it through now, though I read it this morning hurriedly—if it is in the bill, it is a benefit.

Mr. SPOONER. It is in the bill in this way, if I understand it, though I do not know very much about it. I think it is a part of the agreement which the railroad companies require the employee to make when he enters their service, that he shall become a contributor to the benefit-relief associations. It is done in that way.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad to say that some of the courts of the United States will not hold a contract of that kind binding. I am glad to know that there is some judicial conscience left on that question.

Why, Mr. President, just think of it! Here are hundreds and thousands of employees who form a little organization for the protection of themselves and their families in the nature of temporary insurance. They take from their wages and put in a common fund from week to week, from month to month, and year to year, a little beneficiary fund. They go on discharging their duties, and while engaged in the line of duty are crippled for life, or their lives are destroyed, and when an action is brought against the company for negligence in destroying their lives or crippling them their interest in this little fund is taken from them and goes to the benefit of the company. There is not a man upon the face of this continent or any other, who has a true sense of manhood in his breast, who will justify such a transaction.

Mr. President, there are other objections to this measure, which I shall not at this time go into in detail. I only intended in a general way to call attention to some glaring defects and to throw out a mere observation, so that others who might see fit to examine the question more thoroughly would follow; but here is this bill, and there never was a finer illustration of the spider and the fly than is found in this measure.

"Will you walk into my parlor?" said a spider to a fly;
"'Tis the prettiest little parlor that ever you did spy."

Some hand hidden to me has framed this bill. Its framers have said to the laboring man: "This is a panacea for you; here are provisions for your benefit. If you want to accept it, this means arbitration; this means mediation; this means friendship;" and when the laboring men walk into the meshes provided for them in this bill they will be bound hand and foot and subject to the control of the Federal courts by the writ of injunction, for they are then slaves of the corporations by the provisions of statute.

Mr. KYLE. I move to strike out the clause beginning in line 25, on page 2, section 1, and going down to the end of line 7, on page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, on page 2, after line 24, it is proposed to strike out:

The wages paid by carriers subject to this act for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation aforesaid, or in connection therewith, or for the receiving, delivering, storage, and handling of such property, and the rules and regulations governing such employees, shall be reasonable and just. This provision shall not affect the right to make contracts for such wages not in contravention of any of the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. In section 3, page 4, line 14, after the word "within," I move to strike out "forty-eight hours" and insert "five days."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the amendment?

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to that amendment, but I want to offer an amendment to the same section.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be stated from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 4, line 14, after the word "within," it is proposed to strike out "forty-eight hours" and insert "five days;" so as to read:

The two thus chosen shall select the third commissioner of arbitration; but, in the event of their failure to name such arbitrator within five days after their first meeting, the third arbitrator shall be named by the commissioners named in the preceding section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 16 of the same section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 4, after the word "section," at the end of line 16, it is proposed to insert:

A majority of said arbitrators shall be competent to make a valid and binding award under the provisions hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. In line 19 of the same section, after the word "employees," I move to insert "shall specify the time and place of meeting of said board of arbitration."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. In the same section, line 23, page 4, before the word "days," I move to strike out "five" and insert "ten;" so that the board of arbitration shall commence their hearing within ten days from the date of the appointment of the three arbitrators, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. In the same section, line 25, on page 4, before the word "days," I move to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty;" so as to provide for the filing of the award within thirty days, instead of twenty, as the bill stood.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. In the same section, on page 5, line 4, after the word "award," I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 5, line 4, after the word "award," it is proposed to insert "and the papers and proceedings relating thereto."

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest to the Senator that perhaps he ought to add "including the testimony."

Mr. KYLE. Very well; I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 5, after the word "award," it is proposed to insert "and the papers and proceedings, including the testimony, relating thereto."

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. In the same section, on page 5, line 5, before the word "district," I move to strike out "any" and insert "the;" and in line 6 to strike out the words "employer carries on business" and insert "controversy arising on the arbitration is entered into."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. On page 7, in section 5, line 14, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 5, on page 7, line 14, before the word "books," it is proposed to strike out "all" and insert "such;" and in the same line, after the word "documents," to strike out "relating to any" and insert "material to a just determination of the matters under investigation as may be ordered by the court."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. In the same section, on page 7, line 17, after the word "testify," I move to insert "and to produce such books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. In line 24, in section 6, on page 7, I move to strike out all after the word "acknowledged" down to the end of line 13, on page 8, and insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 6, on page 7, line 24, after the word "acknowledged," it is proposed to strike out:

Shall be delivered to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who shall at once cause a notice in writing to be served upon the arbitrators fixing a time and place for a meeting of the arbitrators.

If an agreement of arbitration shall be entered into conforming to this act, except that it shall be executed by employees individually instead of by a labor organization as their representative, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Commissioner of Labor shall decline to call a meeting of arbitrators thereunder unless, upon evidence satisfactory to them, it be shown that the employees signing the submission represent or include a majority of all employees in the service of the same employer and of the same grade and class, and that an award pursuant to said submission can justly be regarded as binding upon all such employees.

And insert:

A copy of the same shall be transmitted to the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who shall file the same in the office of said commission. Any agreement of arbitration which shall be entered into conforming to this act (except that it shall be executed by the employees individually instead of by a labor organization as their representative) shall, when duly acknowledged as herein provided, be transmitted to the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who shall cause a notice in writing to be served upon the arbitrators, fixing a time and place for the meeting of said board, which shall be within fifteen days from the execution of said agreement of arbitration: Provided, however, That the said Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall decline to call a meeting of arbitrators under said agreement unless it shall be shown to his satisfaction that the employees signing the submission represent or include a majority of all the employees in the service of the same employer and of the same grade and class, and that an award pursuant to said submission can justly be regarded as binding upon all such employees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. In section 7, on page 8, line 19, after the word "strikes," I move to strike out "or boycotts."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. At the end of section 7 I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 7 by adding at the end thereof the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any employer, party to such arbitration, from reducing the number of its or his employees whenever in its or his judgment business interests require such reduction.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. On page 10, line 6, I move to make the changes indicated on the sheet I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 6, section 9, strike out the words "after due" and insert "upon;" and after the word "employees," in the same line, insert "said notice to be not less than twenty days before the hearing upon the receiver's petition or application, and to be posted upon all customary bulletin boards along or upon the railway operated by such receiver or receivers."

Mr. GORMAN. Let it be read as it will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That whenever receivers appointed by Federal courts are in the possession and control of railroads, the employees upon such railroads shall have the right to be heard in such courts upon all questions affecting the terms and conditions of their employment through the officers and representatives of their associations, whether incorporated or unincorporated, and no reduction of wages shall be made by such receivers without the authority of the court therefor upon notice to such employees, said notice to be not less than twenty days before the hearing upon the receiver's petition or application, and to be posted upon all customary bulletin boards along or upon the railway operated by such receiver or receivers.

Mr. GORMAN. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. In section 11, line 10, I move to strike out all after the word "that" and insert in lieu thereof what I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. In section 11, page 11, line 10, strike out all after the word "that" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Each member of said board of arbitration shall receive a compensation of $10 per day for the time he is actually employed and his traveling and other necessary expenses, and a sum of money sufficient to pay the same, together with the traveling and other necessary and proper expenses of any conciliation or arbitration had hereunder, to be approved by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, is hereby appropriated for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1898, and June 30, 1899, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator that he ought to fix a sum for those two years, instead of making an indefinite appropriation at the discretion of one officer of the Government. Such legislation we have been trying to avoid for a long time. I suggest that he had better fix some reasonable sum for the two years. A provision that the money shall be expended upon the order of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission is very crude.

Mr. KYLE. I might suggest an amendment in reference to the expenses, that they shall not exceed $5,000 in any one year. I think it probably will not need that much. At any rate, it will be ample.

Mr. SPOONER. As the Senator is fixing a maximum sum and the men are to receive compensation only for the days actually employed and their necessary traveling expenses, I think that he ought to make it larger than $5,000. One of these strikes which we hope will be prevented by the bill costs millions of dollars, and the Government can very easily expend money in carrying forward these arbitrations if they are practicable at all, and I think they are.

Mr. KYLE. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "hereunder" the words "not to exceed $5,000 in any one year."

The SECRETARY. After the word "hereunder" in the amendment it is proposed to insert the words "not to exceed $5,000 in any one year."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELKINS. Where does that come in? Will the Chair please advise me as to what line and what page?

Mr. KYLE. Section 11, page 11.

Mr. ELKINS. What is the section?

The SECRETARY. The section, if amended, will read as follows:

SEC. 11. That each member of said board of arbitration shall receive a compensation of $10 per day for the time he is actually employed and his traveling and other necessary expenses, and a sum of money sufficient to pay the same, together with the traveling and other necessary and proper expenses of any conciliation or arbitration had hereunder, not to exceed $5,000 in any one year, to be approved by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, is hereby appropriated for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1898, and June 30, 1899, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. ELKINS. Do I understand that this provision makes the Government pay all the expenses of the arbitration?

Mr. KYLE. I so understand.

Mr. ELKINS. The usual way is for each party to the arbitration to pay half of the expense. Here it is provided that the Government shall pay all the expenses, when the Government really has no interest in the transaction.

Mr. KYLE. I think if we can bring about any conciliation in the case of strikes, etc., it is a very small appropriation to bring about that end.

Mr. ELKINS. Would it not be better to add this to the duties of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, who are already paid salaries, and who have time to attend to such matters? It seems to me the Senator should accept a substitute for his amendment that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall attend to this question of settling differences. They are employed on railroad matters and understand all questions pertaining to railroads; and should not the power to arbitrate be conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission? It has time to give to the question; besides, the commission is composed of able men of the highest character and well informed on all questions pertaining to railroads. The country has confidence in the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, both employers and employees.

Mr. SPOONER. The trouble with that is that you can not—nobody can, not even Congress, with all its omnipotence—compel a carrier or a man to submit his controversy to anybody. It is a matter of agreement. It is not compulsory. It is voluntary.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me ask the Senator whether we could not make the voluntary feature apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission as well as any other body?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not see how you can compel anybody, voluntarily, to submit anything to anybody.

Mr. ELKINS. If arbitration of any kind is desired, let the Interstate Commerce Commission act as one of the arbitrators, or refer the whole matter to the commission to decide under proper rules and regulations.

Mr. SPOONER. Ordinarily an arbitration is conducted by men chosen by the parties. It is a voluntary matter.

Mr. ELKINS. The Government of the United States, as I understand it, is to pay $5,000 a year to the arbitrators. This is creating offices with a lot of expenses in a matter in which the United States has no direct interest. The parties in interest pay the expenses of arbitration.

Mr. SPOONER. It does not create any offices.

Mr. ELKINS. The amendment says, "Not to exceed $5,000 a year."

Mr. SPOONER. That is to pay the actual expenses of the arbitrators.

Mr. ELKINS. It is $5,000. We already have a commission, which, it is true, has a great deal to do, and is a very important commission, with very important duties; but if this bill were framed so as to confer the power upon it, it seems to me they could act as arbitrators, or one of their number could be one of the arbitrators. This would be better than for the United States to pay the expenses of an arbitration to which it is not a party.

Mr. SPOONER. The Government of the United States is interested in preventing strikes which arrest the transportation of the mail and put an embargo upon the commerce of the country from one State to another.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator, I am sure, is not in favor of paternalism to the extent that the Government is to constitute a board of arbitration and pay the expenses. Why not provide arbitration for all other industries and interests, coal mining, manufacturing, shipping—in fact, for all business? Why should arbitration be provided exclusively for railroads? But if confined exclusively to railroads, why not let the Interstate Commerce Commission be the arbitrators in the first instance to settle all controversies between employees and the companies? I do not see why the bill is confined to the railroads and no other business.

If we are going to authorize arbitrating disputes—and I am not prepared to say it is unwise legislation—let us take in all other branches of industry. Why should railroads be the only industry or interest to which arbitration can apply? There are other interests all over the country of great magnitude and great moment, inland shipping for instance, coal and other mining business, telegraph, telephone, and express companies, besides manufacturing industries of all kinds.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is now getting wild on the subject of paternalism.

Mr. ELKINS. I am not wild about paternalism.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator suppose Congress has the power to make any provision as to coal miners?

Mr. ELKINS. Does the Senator from Wisconsin think this proposed act is constitutional to start with? If a law can be made for railroads, one can be made to apply to other industries of an interstate character.

Mr. SPOONER. This is confined entirely to men engaged in interstate commerce, the regulation of which is vested in Congress.

Mr. ELKINS. Page 2, line 25, and page 3, lines 1 and 2, provide that wages shall be reasonable and just. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, who is an able lawyer——

Mr. CULLOM. That provision has gone out.

Mr. SPOONER. It has gone out.

Mr. ELKINS. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. SPOONER. It was done while the Senator from West Virginia was attending to some other business.

Mr. ELKINS. I am glad to hear that it has been stricken out, because it raises a question that must lead to litigation in the courts.

I think we are hardly prepared to go into the business of regulating differences between employers and employees and paying all the expenses incident thereto. I favor the principle of voluntary arbitration, but I do not think the United States should pay the expenses. The United States is not a party to this transaction. If this step is taken in the interest of maintaining order, preserving the peace, and facilitating the transportation of the mails and of commerce generally, then it gets to be a very broad question, and I do not think we are authorized to put all the expense on the United States. It is too much.

What I object to is that, having an Interstate Commerce Commission, which has jurisdiction of all kinds of questions growing out of interstate commerce, we do not confer the authority sought to be conferred by the pending bill upon that body, already created by law, which has been in operation a long number of years, and where the salaries and expenses are paid by the Government. The Government of the United States ought not to be required in a matter in which it has only an indirect or remote interest to pay the expenses, and that is why I object to the amendment or the whole clause which provides for paying the expenses. The principle of the bill is good, but its provisions should be framed with great care.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I disagree entirely with the Senator from West Virginia that the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to take charge of this matter. I think it is one of the last things the commission ought to have to do with in the way of determining. It is a matter that is foreign to the idea on which it was created.

I wish to state to the Senator from West Virginia another thing. While I trust that great good is to come from this measure, providing for voluntary arbitration, there is one provision in the bill which has excited a great deal of antagonism from quarters that are deeply interested in it and which to me is worth all the remainder of the bill. I refer to the provision which takes hold for the first time of receivers of railroads appointed by Federal courts, who ride over the rights of all the patrons of the road and practically all of their employees, who get orders to issue certificates in disregard of the rights of stockholders and bondholders, and who manage the employees under the threat of their being brought up for contempt of court.

Everybody, whether he is in favor of fair legislation to corporations or not, ought to agree that that is one of the abuses which has brought on the acute trouble we have had in the last four or five years.

That provision of the bill is the one that is being antagonized and in regard to which, I take it, Senators on both sides of the Chamber have been communicated with by the officers of Federal courts called receivers for bankrupt corporations. It is a wise provision and one which, if there was nothing else in the bill, ought to commend the measure to every Senator on this floor, for that should be controlled by Congress and the Federal courts should be restrained from imprisoning workingmen simply because they have views of their own rights and act sometimes indiscreetly, if you please, but independently always. That provision of the bill alone ought to commend it to the American Congress, and the matter of spending $5,000 a year or $10,000 a year for these commissioners is a mere bagatelle.

I suggested to the Senator in charge of the bill that there ought not to be an appropriation without naming the amount. That is unfair and unsatisfactory in the interest of the Government. All the people ought to favor a fixed amount. I trust that $5,000 is enough. If it is not, I am ready to vote $10,000. It is worth $50,000 per annum to do no more than to correct and restrain Federal judges and the receivers whom they appoint. I should like to see Congress go beyond it, and they ought to do it at a very early day, and say that no receiver shall be appointed for a railroad and kept in office perpetually; that at least every two or three years the stockholders of the bankrupt corporation ought to have the right to determine who the receiver shall be, and not the Federal judge.

Mr. RAWLINS. I wish to ask a question for information, if the Senator from Maryland will yield. To what provision does the Senator allude when he speaks of some beneficent provision in the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. He refers to the ninth section.

Mr. GORMAN. Page 9 of the bill, section 9, which has been amended and enlarged by an amendment just offered.

Mr. RAWLINS. Is that the only provision?

Mr. GORMAN. The only one; and it is a very wise one, in my judgment.

Mr. RAWLINS. Perhaps I misapprehend the scope of it. It does not contain anything restricting the power of the court, but it simply prevents receivers from reducing wages without the men first having notice of it.

Mr. GORMAN. That is precisely what I have stated, and it is a very valuable provision. There are a half a dozen cases, for about one-fourth of the railroads of the country are in the hands of receivers. Take the case of the road with which I am very familiar, that which enters this city. A Federal judge living in an adjoining State, the State of the Senator from West Virginia, comes into his court, and without notice to anybody, entirely upon the application of the receiver, orders are entered that receivers' certificates for any amount—millions in this case—be issued. In the matter of his employees, after arbitration as provided for in this bill, without that provision the receiver would have the perfect right, without notice to the employees, to dispose of them and dismiss them because of some supposed offense, perhaps because of the very act for which the arbitration had occurred, and the employee, unlike one in the employ of a solvent road, would be directly under the eye and control of the court, and after what has occurred heretofore, in all probability he would find himself in prison.

This provision is that no such action shall be taken by the receiver without notice to the men who are affected, and in addition to such notice, as I understand, the men are advised of the trial of the case and of the time set for trial, and notice thereof is to be published on the bulletin boards. That is a grand provision. It does not go far enough for me, but I am content with it at present. I would go beyond that, and I trust Congress will, and restrict the power of the courts in the matter of the appointment of receivers, not making them permanent and indefinite and not leaving the employees at their mercy under this threat of the court, and also restraining their power as to the term for which they shall occupy these places and squander money over which the bondholder has no control and absolutely ruining the stockholder. That, however, is an entirely different phase, and must be dealt with hereafter. This one provision in the bill, if there were nothing else, I want to say to the Senator from West Virginia, is worth not only the $5,000 a year, but $50,000. Yes, it is without price; and it ought to be agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to call his attention to a fact?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. This section not only provides against any reduction of wages by receivers appointed by a court, without notice, but it also authorizes the men, through their officers and representatives, to be heard on the subject.

Mr. GORMAN. It is a wise provision.

Mr. SPOONER. They are to be heard in a formal way, which is worth a good deal.

Mr. ELKINS. I am very glad to have the approval of the Senator from Maryland of section 9, but it seems to me the last two lines enlarge the powers of the courts, the very thing to which he objects. Lines 4, 5, and 6 read as follows:

> And no reduction of wages shall be made by such receivers without the authority of the court therefor after due notice to such employees.

Why do you give the power to the courts exclusively to cut down wages? Why not leave this to the management, with right of appeal to the courts?

Mr. GORMAN. This is a restriction of his power.

Mr. TELLER. He has the power now.

Mr. ELKINS. It says:

> And no reduction of wages shall be made by such receivers.

Mr. SPOONER. "Without the authority of the court therefor."

Mr. ELKINS. The point I make is that you are enlarging the power of the court.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. ELKINS. You are giving the court more power. The receiver shall not reduce wages unless the court says so.

Mr. SPOONER. The court, of course, has authority now to authorize a reduction of wages.

Mr. GORMAN. Without a hearing to the men.

Mr. SPOONER. This provides that the receiver shall not do it. He must first be authorized by the court to do it, and the men shall have an opportunity to be heard on application before the court upon due notice before the court does it.

Mr. ELKINS. I thought that that section, and I think so yet, enlarges the power of the court. I agree with the Senator from Maryland that receivers have too much power generally and continue too long in office, and that is one of the abuses of which the people generally have a right to complain. The practice of administering bankrupt railroads is getting to be so profitable that people seek the opportunity to wind them up and to put them into the hands of receivers for that purpose.

There is more money made out of it to-day than there is out of the railroad business proper. Indeed, the most profitable business now in connection with railroads in the United States is the receiver's business. A railroad gets in the hands of a receiver, and then it must be reorganized. Everybody is paid out of the poor stockholder's money or that of the bondholder.

Perhaps the Senator from Wisconsin is right, that these lines do not enlarge the power of the courts. It seemed to me when I first read it—and I just glanced at it—that it did.

Mr. FRYE. It reduces the power.

Mr. ELKINS. If that is not the construction, I have no objection; but I thought it enlarged the power of the courts.

Mr. FRYE. It is a limitation by the extent of the hearing.

Mr. ELKINS. I think the courts, in the matter of revenues and reorganizing railroads, have or take too much power. As a rule, judges of courts are not experienced railroad men; yet these judges, in cases of railroads in the hands of receivers, actually operate them.

Mr. RAWLINS. As I understand it, the legal effect of a contract for wages depends upon the consent of the employer and the employee, and no court and no receiver has any arbitrary authority to reduce those wages except by the consent of both parties, either express or implied; and the suggestion which has occurred to me in respect to this matter is that this purports to give an express authority to the courts and to receivers to reduce wages without such consent of the parties to the contract, either express or implied, an authority which I think we have no power to confer.

Mr. SPOONER. The trouble with that is that the Supreme Court has decided a number of times, and it is administered as law throughout the country, that where a road is put into the hands of a receiver, on the foreclosure of the mortgage, the receiver, with the authority of the court, sometimes without it, is at liberty to repudiate all contracts made after the lien created by the mortgage was entered into; and so you find in every foreclosure vast numbers of contracts, which were entered into subsequent to the lien, repudiated by the court, or some affirmed and some disaffirmed.

Mr. RAWLINS. I understand, but that does not reach the objection which occurs to me as to this section. That relates to the question of the means of paying wages, which are determined in accordance with the contracts which the parties have made. The courts have ruled, of course, that certain liens are preferred, sometimes preventing the employees, by the rules which they adopt, from obtaining the wages which, in accordance with the contract, they are entitled to receive. But this provision is expressly to the effect that the courts may, upon notice, without the consent of the employee, reduce his wages.

Mr. SPOONER. I was not referring to that class of debts which are held to be preferred. That is a class of indebtedness which the courts sometimes put ahead of the mortgage lien for reasons which the Senator understands very well.

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. The rule, as administered in the Federal courts—I think in all the courts—has been that contracts which were made subsequent to the creation of the mortgage lien, which had been foreclosed, are at the mercy of the court and the receiver.

Mr. RAWLINS. That is the sole point I desire to make in respect to the matter. It seems to me it is subject to the objection that we are here undertaking to exact services from a class of people, one or many—the principle is the same of course—for wages or for a price not agreed to by the party to be employed or who renders the service, but to be an arbitrary price to be fixed by the court. I do not think we are prepared to enact any legislation that shall imply that any class of people shall be held to serve anybody without their consent.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course if there is anything of that kind in the bill, it ought to be taken out. The court can not compel men to remain in the service a moment after they desire to quit. That is very clear. But the court can authorize its receiver to reduce wages, and sometimes the receivers have reduced wages without giving the men any notice. If the terms fixed by the court or the receiver are not satisfactory, the men may quit. They have a perfect right to quit. They can quit in a body or quit individually. But this provision is that no receiver shall reduce the wages of the men or change the schedule, the rules which govern the performance of the services one way or the other, without first having the authority of the court, and he can not have the authority of the court without first giving notice to the men and allowing them to be heard. That is all this amounts to.

Mr. RAWLINS. When a road is put into the hands of a receiver by order of court the receiver is the hand of the court to operate the road, and he is supposed on all occasions to be under the direction of the court and the court is responsible for whatever the receiver may do. As I understand the practice, the rule—with some exceptions it may be, but certainly it is the correct rule—which has usually been followed by the courts, is that the receiver may not reduce the wages except by the direction of the court. Where they have undertaken to do so the employees have come to the court and the courts have usually, perhaps there may have been some exceptions, given them a hearing, and in many instances restored the wages to what the court thought would be reasonable.

Of course, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, if the wages are reduced, the employee may quit; he may accept the reduced wages or not, as he may see proper. But it seems to me that this provision amounts to nothing more than what the rule already is, what the practice of the court is upon this question, provided the court follows the usual practice.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is partly right, as I understand it, but there have been a number of cases in which the courts have authorized receivers to reduce wages and change the schedules without the men having had an opportunity to be heard. This makes it a matter of law, binding upon the Federal courts, of course upon their officials, the receivers, that the wages and schedules shall not be changed without notice to the men, and an opportunity shall be given to them or their representatives in the labor organizations to be heard before the court passes. That is the purpose of the amendment, and it certainly accomplishes it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the custom has been, I think, so far as I have observed, for the receivers to go ahead and manage the road without much reference to the court except in cases where there was some necessity for applying to the court. As a rule, they have gone to work and reduced the wages if they saw fit, and discharged people, and then applied to the court, if there was any trouble about it, to have the court approve it. One difficulty in that matter has been that the organizations are not corporations. They have no legal standing, and a controversy of that kind must be carried on in the name practically of one individual.

The ninth section now provides that, whether they are incorporated or not, their associations shall have standing in court for the purpose of protecting the members of the association in their contract with the railroad company. It does not presuppose that the court may not reduce wages and dismiss men, because you could not very well run a railroad unless that power existed somewhere, but it puts it in the court, after these men have had an opportunity to be heard, when, as a rule, they are never heard now.

Mr. President, I wish to say merely a word or two upon the pending bill. A year or two ago I myself undertook to draft a bill on the line of this measure, and I gave it up as a task too great for me. I found so many difficulties that I could not see how I could get a voluntary arbitration bill, and I could not see how to get any other that would be effective. I have great doubt about this bill being effective, but it is a very good effort, I think, in the direction in which everybody wants to see something done.

I understand that the labor people, the leaders, and the people who have given great thought to this subject, and who ought to know as much about it as anybody, are satisfied with this bill. I understand that the railroad companies are satisfied with it. Their representatives have gone over it. I think the railroad companies realize that their interest and the interest of the public requires some method of settling controversies between them and their employees. As the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] said, a strike costs a great deal of money. It costs a great deal of money to the employees of the road; it costs a great deal of money to the railroad; a great deal of money to the public; and if by any system of voluntary arbitration we can get rid of strikes, it is greatly to be desired.

The Government takes the initiatory steps through its Interstate Commerce Commission. If they can bring about a mediation and a settlement, all right. If not, then the parties are left to voluntary arbitration. The objection made by the Senator from Wisconsin that we ought to send it to a commission, it seems to me, is not a very good one, because the employees or the railroad company, one or the other, might say, "We will not submit to it." There must be a board of arbitration that these people will agree to in some shape.

Having agreed to it and having gone into the controversy, then the question is who shall pay the expense. There never has been a strike in this country where it would not have paid the Government of the United States to have borne any reasonable and just expenses to secure an arbitration, if that could have been done. The delay of the mails and the obstruction to business is such that it will be very profitable for the Government to engage in arbitration if it can do so. Inasmuch as the Government can not bring about an arbitration of its own force and must depend upon these people, and they must be satisfied with the board, I think it is as little as the Government can do to pay the expenses of it. I do not suppose there will be any abuse on that score. If there is, further legislation can correct it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate on the pending measure, but I introduced a bill which I think is almost identical with the one reported from the committee, and it is a subject in which I have taken a good deal of interest. The bill I know was submitted to the Department of Labor, and it was also submitted to members of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Certainly the secretary of that commission gave a great deal of time and attention to it. So it is not a crude or hastily prepared bill. It is asked for by all the organizations of railroad employees on one side, and I think, from the best information I can get, it is not objected to by any reasonable representatives of the railroad companies on the other. I believe myself that it is a beneficial measure; that even if it does not go as far as many of us would perhaps like, it will serve a great purpose; that it will tend to reduce the number of strikes, which are always such a misfortune to the country when they occur.

We have had for many years in my State a board of voluntary arbitration. It has been of the greatest possible benefit. It has not stopped all strikes, but it has stopped a great many, and it has settled them, and settled them in such a way that both sides to the controversy have felt that they have been treated with justice.

This bill, asked for by these organizations of railroad men, is a most reasonable bill, and it seems to me it would be a most valuable and beneficial measure for Congress to pass. If there are defects in it they can be cured after the experiment has had a fair trial.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, I presume it is true, as I have heard it stated, that the pending bill was prepared by the representatives of the railroad employees who are to be affected by it, but I should consider it cruel and wicked to take advantage of the inexperience of this class of our citizens for the purpose of fastening upon them legislation which would be injurious to their true interests.

I am suspicious of the bill, notwithstanding it comes from this quarter, because of the friends that it has made. I observe that all our statesmen who have been in the habit of looking at the interests of corporations and aggregated capital through the big end of the telescope and at the interests of the laboring men through the little end of the telescope are in favor of this measure. I have looked somewhat into the history of the bill. I see that it passed the House of Representatives on the 4th day of this month under whip and spur, under the rule invoking the previous question, at the instance of gentlemen who are in the habit of looking at questions between capital and labor in the manner I have indicated.

But, Mr. President, there is a principle involved in the bill which is more important even, in my judgment, than any question between capital and labor, and I believe Senators ought to look at it and dispose of it in the light of that principle. From the time when courts were first organized in England down to the present time there never had been a precedent in which a court of equity has undertaken to enforce the observance of a contract for personal labor until Judge Jenkins undertook to enforce it in the decision which is so well known—made by him in the circuit in Wisconsin in the case of the employees of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

The rule which the courts have strictly and strenuously adhered to through all the period from the first organization of courts down to the present time has its motive in personal liberty. It would be a monstrous innovation upon law and constitutional principles for legislation enacted by Congress to recognize the proposition that any man can be compelled to labor one moment longer than he wants to labor, no matter what contract he may make compelling him to do so. As my honored friend from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] said in his remarks this afternoon, it would amount to imposing involuntary servitude upon a portion of the citizens of this Republic. Whether the Supreme Court of the United States or other courts would recognize it or not makes no difference; I do not think the Congress of the United States can afford to enact legislation which will in fact impose, under certain conditions, involuntary servitude upon any class of our citizens in this country.

This bill provides for arbitration. Then it provides that after the arbitration shall have taken place and an award shall have been made, the courts may enforce that award upon both parties—both upon the railroad company and upon the employees of the railroad company. It is true that the bill says the courts may not punish for contempt for refusing to abide by the award, but it does say that the courts may enforce the award, which means that the courts, by such appropriate process as may be known to them outside of the punishment for contempt, may compel laboring men to labor upon the railroads whether they want to do so or not.

There are other means of compelling obedience to the award besides punishment for contempt. I can not enumerate all of them now. A court of equity would have the right to sequester the wages of laboring men, I assume, for violating its injunction. The question of the enforcement of the award may lead to many collateral and indirect issues which can be enforced by fine and imprisonment for contempt and which may indirectly have the same effect.

But whether that be true or not, we are undertaking to put in the legislation of Congress a provision that citizens of this Republic may be compelled to labor when they do not want to labor, and I say we are not only violating the Constitution of the United States in providing for a species of involuntary servitude, but we are also violating a principle as old as the common law, that the courts will not in restraint of the liberty of the people undertake to enforce by specific performance or otherwise contracts for the performance of personal services.

So, Mr. President, if our laboring men in the United States were assembled out here in front of the Capitol clamoring for the passage of this bill, while I think I am as good a friend of the laboring man as any person in this body, although I do not pose as the champion of the laboring men or as the champion of the railroads, I will not give my vote for the bill, because I do not propose to vote for any measure which in my judgment violates the Constitution of the United States and introduces into our legislation a vicious principle which has never before been recognized and which has always been frowned upon by the courts.

Mr. President, it is confessed upon all hands that this bill is very imperfectly drawn. It is not perfect by any means. Yet gentlemen say that their desire for some remedy for the evils which have heretofore existed is so great that they are willing to vote for the measure. I think the better course would be to recommit the bill and let such a bill be framed as would be just, both to the corporations and the laboring men, in consonance with the Constitution of the United States and in consonance with the wise practices of the courts both in this country and in England from the very earliest period down to the present time.

England has dealt with this question of labor and the disputes between laboring men and their employees, and nearly all of her colonies have done so. They have dealt with it with the principle in mind which I am trying to enforce upon the Senate, and they have scrupulously avoided any interference or any attempt to invade that principle. I have had occasion to examine arbitration bills passed in some of the colonies of England, and such a bill can be prepared and passed through the Congress of the United States. While they are efficient, they scrupulously avoid the imposition of compelling the laboring men who work for these corporations to continue to labor unless they voluntarily desire to do so.

The bills that I have in mind provide for voluntary arbitration. They provide fair means for a hearing by both parties. They pro vide for an award and the publication of the award, and for the good offices of the Government in undertaking to carry out the award. But they leave it to a sound public opinion to compel both parties to abide by and accept the award. That, I think, is all that is necessary in this country. It is certainly all that we can constitutionally enact, and it is all that we ought to try to enact.

If the employees of a large transportation company become involved in controversy with their company and both sides invoke the benefit of an arbitration law, both sides will abide by any award that may be made, because public opinion will compel them to do so. I do not think, however others may view the question, that we have power to go any further. We may pass provisions compelling the transportation companies to abide by the award without violating any constitutional provision, but we can not, in my judgment, compel the employees to abide by the award and continue to labor when they do not want to do so without subjecting them to involuntary servitude, something that it is wholly beyond the power of Congress to do, as everybody knows.

As I said, the bill is very imperfectly framed to accomplish anything. Gentlemen assume that the bill will result in quieting controversies between employers and employees for the period of a year. I do not read it that way at all. It will result in quieting them for one month, and that is all. I call the attention of the Senate to the fourth subdivision of section 3, on page 5. That clause reads as follows:

> Fourth. That employees dissatisfied with the award shall not by reason of such dissatisfaction quit the service of the employer before the expiration of three months from and after the making of such award without giving thirty days' notice in writing of their intention so to quit.

Any employee who is dissatisfied with the award may be compelled to labor for thirty days, but he can not be compelled to labor any longer; and as to him the bill quiets the controversy for thirty days. The succeeding clause makes the same provision concerning the railroads:

> Nor shall the employer dissatisfied with such award dismiss any employee or employees on account of such dissatisfaction before the expiration of three months from and after the making of such award without giving thirty days' notice in writing of his intention so to discharge.

So any railroad company, feeling that it has been worsted in the arbitration with its employees, immediately after the award has been made, gives notice to every one of its employees that it is dissatisfied with the award and that at the expiration of thirty days it will dispense with their services. Now, what kind of arbitration is that, Mr. President? What kind of a settling of difficulties is that? Is that worth the appropriation of $5,000 or 5 cents? The effect of it is manifestly in the interest of the railroads. They can afford to give the notice and wait thirty days before discharging their employees and employing others at less wages. The employees can not do so; they work on.

More than this, Mr. President, I think there is a good deal of justice in the claim which I heard made the other day that it places the rights of individuals in jeopardy when they themselves have had no lot or part or parcel in submitting their rights to that jeopardy. Labor organizations are useful and valuable institutions in this country, but I should like to know what right a labor organization has to bind and conclude the men who may be working on railroads who do not belong to the labor organization. Yet that is what this bill provides. It not only provides involuntary servitude for those who voluntarily enter into the arbitration, but it provides involuntary servitude for those who may be working on railroads and who do not belong to the labor organization.

Then, again, the method of selecting the arbitrators as provided in the bill is a vicious one and one that will undoubtedly operate in the interest of the railroads and against the interest of the employees. I say no arbitrators ought to be permitted to adjudicate between a raiload company and its employees who are not entirely satisfactory to both parties to the controversy.

Now, after having concluded to enter into arbitration, the labor organization selects one of the arbitrators, the railroad company selects another, and then they strive for a limited period to select a third man. If they do not succeed in selecting the third arbitrator, then the duty of making the selection is devolved upon others. I have no criticism to place upon the gentlemen who are now filling the public positions which are named as the proper positions to designate this third arbitrator.

I undertake to say, if this bill becomes a law, it will not be very long before the railroad companies have satisfactory individuals in those offices, who will give them nine times out of ten, if not ten times out of ten, this satisfactory man. We know that they are pushing all the time; they are powerful; they are influential in elections; they have ways of securing the employment of those who are favorable to their interests that the laboring men have not. I am not saying this for the purpose of blaming them at all, because everybody is going to work for his own interest; but every man knows that in a controversy between a railroad company and its employees, wherein some third person is to perform an office, if there is any favoritism shown in that matter, unless we succeed in the phenomenon of securing some officer who is absolutely above all prejudice or all favor, this third arbitrator will inevitably be in the interest of the railroad company, and the employees in this controversy will go into the arbitration with a stacked deck against them.

I say that we ought not to have any arbitration, we ought not to provide for any arbitration, unless the law gives to private parties the right to say who this third person shall be who is supposed to be the impartial umpire between them. If they want to arbitrate, if they desire to have their differences settled by arbitration, undoubtedly they will reach an agreement by making mutual concessions.

All of these things impress my mind with the fact that this bill, however it may have been drawn, by whomsoever it may have been drawn, and by whomsoever it may now be pressed, is not in the true interest of the railroad employees in this country, but will make largely for the interests of the railroads themselves. Further than that, it will strike a deadly blow at a principle which has always been held to by our ancestors and by curselves, which ought not now to be departed from by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator from South Dakota, who has this bill in charge, that owing to the great number of important amendments which have been made to it we ought to have a reprint of the bill with all the amendments before we proceed to vote upon it. It is a very important bill, and it is very hard for us to tell now just what will be the effect of all these amendments.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to say——

Mr. KYLE. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that for several days——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. KYLE. We have had this bill under consideration on several days, and at each time I have got unanimous consent for its consideration I have had to give way for some other measure. To-morrow I understand the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] will call up the census bill, and that the agreement for unanimous consent which we had to-day will be waived.

This bill has been under consideration for quite a long time in both Houses of Congress and for several months before the committees of both Houses, and I think it has been fully discussed. It is a bill which the laboring people connected with the railroads of the United States want; it is the railway trainmen's bill.

They comprise about 326,000 men—nearly a million of the people in the United States; 1 in 79 of our population, men, women, and children, and 1 in 15 of the voters of the United States. They have not only as a national organization approved of this bill, but they have taken the bill and submitted it to the several local organizations of the United States, by whom it has been universally approved. It may have its imperfections; I grant that it has; but no voluntary arbitration bill can be drawn without imperfections; and I think the Senators in this body will testify to the good offices of a voluntary arbitration bill, however imperfect it may be. We all recall the arbitration law of 1888, which is proposed to be repealed by this bill.

Mr. HOAR. I supposed I was yielding to the Senator to answer a question.

Mr. KYLE. I want to say just one word more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. HOAR. I yield.

Mr. KYLE. I had some part in the settlement of the great Chicago strike only a few years ago. I went with the leaders of the labor organizations to the then President of the United States, and there got the consent of the railway trainmen to bring about a cessation of the strike, providing the President would appoint an arbitration commission under the provisions of the statute of 1888. President Cleveland agreed to appoint that commission, and there and then, in the presence of the President, these railway trainmen declared the strike off; and under the provisions of the statute of 1888, imperfect as it was, the great Chicago strike came to an end.

I believe, Mr. President, that the strikes in this country will practically come to an end, as was said by Mr. Morrissey, the chairman of the Railway Trainmen's Association, if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. President, I hope we can get a vote to-night on the bill. If the Senator from Minnesota has an amendment he desires to offer, he can offer it, and in a very few moments we shall be able to close the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has the floor.

Mr. NELSON. I think I had the floor, and yielded to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE]. I will not take up any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator may desire to discuss the bill, but I simply want to add a single sentence to an amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I have no intention to participate in the discussion, but a number of important amendments have been made to the bill this afternoon, and I am not able to judge of the effect of those amendments until I can see a reprint of the bill with all those amendments incorporated in it. I think, in order that we may vote understandingly on the bill, we ought to have it reprinted with the amendments all incorporated in it.

I am in favor of the principle of arbitration. I am not hostile, I want to say to the Senator from South Dakota, to the principle of arbitration; but I want to see that this bill is properly guarded, above all things so as to protect the railroad employees. I think, therefore, the Senator ought to be willing to have a reprint made of the bill, so that we can consider it and understand it thoroughly. That is all I desire to say on this occasion.

Mr. KYLE. I will say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I decline to yield further, Mr. President.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to say a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. HOAR. What I have to say will take but a moment, and I wish to have the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] and of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], as well as the Senator in charge of the bill.

The chief argument against this bill which I have heard is that it contains a provision for specific performance against a laborer of a contract to labor, and, as has been well said by the Senator from Washington, that is a doctrine and proceeding unknown to equity hitherto unless, possibly, in very recent years. It never was supposed that any man could be kept to a civil contract to labor by any authority other than his own.

It seems to me that is a good point; and although the bill says in lines 12 and 13, on page 5, that "No person shall, however, be punished for his failure to comply with the award as for contempt of court," yet it leaves a general provision that the award is to be specifically enforced. The court has got to reconcile those two provisions in some way, which, without calling the process a process for contempt, especially enforces a contract for labor or personal service. I propose to remove that by striking out the words in lines 12 and 13, after the word "permit," and by inserting;

Provided, That no injunction or other legal process shall be issued which shall compel the performance by any laborer against his will of a contract for personal labor or service.

I will move that amendment, and I think that will remove a great part of the objection which has been made in the argument.

Mr. KYLE. I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator in charge of the bill accepts the amendment. Is there any objection to it?

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask to have the proposed amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 5, line 12, after the word "permit," it is proposed to strike out——

Mr. HAWLEY. I want to make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts. It is all very good striking out and inserting what he proposes, but I find these words in lines 10 and 11:

And that the same may be specifically enforced in equity so far as the powers of a court of equity permit.

Mr. HOAR. That leaves it to be specifically enforced against the railroads.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to know how it can be specifically enforced. Is there any way of specifically enforcing a contract which binds one side and does not bind the other?

Mr. HOAR. It binds both sides, except that the process of specific performance in a mere contract for personal labor and services can not issue against the laborer.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I should like to know——

Mr. HOAR. I should like first to have the amendment stated from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 5, line 12, after the word "permit," it is proposed to strike out:

No person shall, however, be punished for his failure to comply with the award as for contempt of court.

And insert:

Provided, That no injunction or other legal process shall be issued which shall compel the performance by any laborer against his will of a contract for personal labor or service.

Mr. TURNER. I should like to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that that does not remove in full the objection. We still have left in this proposed law a declaration that a court of equity may specifically enforce the award, and we still have left in it a mandatory declaration of the law that the employee shall be compelled to submit to the award by laboring for at least three months contrary to his will.

Mr. HOAR. So far as the Senator's first objection is concerned, it does say that the award may be specifically enforced in equity, but it goes on to say, provided that it shall not specifically enforce a contract for personal labor or service. There is an exception.

Mr. TURNER. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator what force and effect he would give to the first clause of the third subdivision and of the fourth clause of section 3?

Mr. HOAR. It leaves the process of specific performance unimpaired, as it should, against corporations; it leaves the power to a court of equity to render a judgment, which any court of law would have now, not a specific performance or punishment in contempt, but an ordinary judgment for a sum of money for a failure to perform the promise to work—the ordinary common law as it is now and always has existed. In regard to the other proposition, I have not examined it.

Mr. TURNER. At the proper time, for the purpose of supplementing the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, I shall move to strike out the fourth subdivision of section 3.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to say about that clause what I said before, that I could not myself see—and in that I am disposed to agree with the Senator from Washington—why that should be left in the bill if the court were deprived of the power to issue an injunction, either a mandatory injunction or one in its nature restraining. I was utterly unwilling that the court should be permitted to enforce its decree by injunction in any form. Therefore, I advised the representatives of these men who came to me that that clause would be misleading and utterly useless, and that it be omitted; but they declined to have it modified in that respect and thought there might be some moral effect from it which would be beneficial to them.

Mr. KYLE. There is a desire on the part of many members in the Chamber to see the amendments in print to-morrow morning; and so I will agree to let the discussion go over to-night if we can have a unanimous-consent agreement to vote to-morrow at a certain hour on the bill, say at 3 o'clock or half past 1—I do not care which.

Mr. HALE. Let it be unanimously agreed that the bill be taken up when the routine morning business is concluded to-morrow.

Mr. KYLE. Exactly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest to the Senator from Maine that an agreement was reached that one-half hour should be devoted after the routine morning business to-morrow to the consideration of pension bills. Of course I can not waive that.

Mr. KYLE. I will ask unanimous consent that we vote upon the proposition at 3 o'clock to-morrow, if that is satisfactory to all Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the vote be taken upon the pending measure at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. CULLOM. Upon the bill and all pending amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the vote be taken upon the bill and all pending amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER. And all amendments which may be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CARTER. Say all amendments then pending.

Mr. CHANDLER. The bill should be open to amendment after the time fixed for voting. There can be but one amendment pending at a time, and the bill should be subject to all amendments which Senators may offer after the hour fixed for voting.

Mr. HALE. That is always done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HAWLEY. I want to give notice that I can not feel bound by an agreement of that sort in one respect. There is pending a conference report as to a very important Army bill, which we discussed, I think, for two days. I did not call it up on last Friday nor on Monday nor on Tuesday, because there seemed to be very strong reasons why certain other business should be continued; but I fear I did wrong. I shall feel obliged to-morrow to insist upon the consideration—and I hope it will be very short—of that conference report. So I simply give notice that I will not be bound by anybody's agreement.

Mr. TELLER. Under those conditions, then, I shall object to an agreement. I do not think that anything is gained by fixing a time and then setting it aside. If we go on with this bill, we shall probably conclude it in the course of an hour or so. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will withdraw his request.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no doubt we shall get through with the conference report referred to by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and the pending bill to-morrow.

Mr. KYLE. I understand that the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has the floor to-morrow at 2 o'clock for the unfinished business, which is the census bill; and I trust he will agree to waive that for the time being.

Mr. CARTER. The Census Committee will waive one hour's time, so as to allow the vote to be taken on this proposition and the pending amendments at 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. I want to suggest to the Senator from Montana that we do not fix any time. Let us take the bill and go through with it. There is no disposition to delay it; but it is a very important bill, and no Senator ought to be prevented from making suggestions or proposing amendments in relation to it.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope that we may have a reprint of the bill made so as to have it before us to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. If there should be a reprint, it is possible that some Senators may have objections to the amendments which have been adopted to-day. I myself do not know what they are; I have not the slightest conception; nor has anybody else who sits in this part of the Chamber, for it was impossible to hear what was going on.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest, if the bill must be reprinted, that it go over until Monday, to be disposed of at a certain hour on that day.

Several SENATORS. That is right.

Mr. KYLE. We can take the bill up to-morrow and finish it while Senators have their minds upon it much more satisfactorily than we can on Monday next.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest, then, that the hour of 4 o'clock to-morrow be fixed as the time for taking the final vote on the bill, so that it may be disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. KYLE. I will agree to that.

Mr. ALLEN. I have an amendment, which is quite important, which I have not yet perfected, but I shall have it ready by to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. I beg pardon of the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I do not object to an agreement if the hour can be put at 4 o'clock. I think to fix it at 3 o'clock would be too short a time.

Mr. ALLEN. If I may be permitted to intervene in this interesting discussion, I was going to suggest that we agree to vote before adjournment to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. That was shown the other day to be of no account, because a quorum will not remain, and the object sought will be entirely defeated.

Mr. ALLEN. We can take this bill up after the routine business to-morrow morning, and discuss it, say, until 4 o'clock, and then vote.

Mr. HALE. Four o'clock will give ample time to everybody.

Mr. CULLOM. I think that will be more time than will be needed.

Mr. TURNER. I have three amendments which I desire to offer to the bill, on one of which I desire to submit a few remarks, and I do not want to be cut off from doing that.

Mr. FAULKNER. That will not cut the Senator off.

Mr. CULLOM. If the hour of 4 o'clock is determined upon, the Senator will have an opportunity of speaking on his amendments, whether they are offered or not at the moment; and it seems to me that will afford ample time to dispose of the bill to-morrow.

Mr. ALLEN. Why not discuss the amendments under the ten-minute rule?

Mr. CULLOM. It would be well enough to get such an agreement.

Mr. ALLEN. That would give everybody an opportunity.

Mr. HALE. Is the proposition that the discussion to-morrow shall be under the ten-minute rule?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is unanimous consent given that the vote on the bill and amendments shall be taken at 4 o'clock to-morrow, and that the discussion on it to-morrow shall proceed under the ten-minute rule?

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. BUTLER. I will not consent to fixing an hour to-morrow to dispose of the bill. There are many amendments which have been made to the bill. There is not one of us who knows the effect of them, and we want to know the condition of the bill by having it reprinted, so that we can examine it to-morrow morning.

I am in favor of the principle of arbitration, but I am not in favor of this bill, as I understand it, because I believe it defeats the principle of arbitration. We may be able to vote to-morrow, but I shall not, for one, consent to fixing an hour to vote until I can see the bill printed with the amendments which have been adopted.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, in order to close this matter, we will let it go over without any unanimous consent, and I shall move to-morrow to take up the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have the bill printed as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the bill will be ordered to be printed as amended.

Mr. GEAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CARTER. I trust the Senator will defer that motion for a moment until some arrangement can be reached with reference to the pending bill.

Mr. GEAR. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest to the Senator from South Dakota that if the vote is not reached to-morrow, the hour of 3 o'clock on Monday be fixed for the final vote on this bill and all amendments to it, and that the discussion to-morrow and Monday shall proceed under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. BUTLER. I think there will be no trouble to-morrow, after we see a reprint of the bill, in having a unanimous-consent agreement fixing a time for the final vote, but this is a bill to which I have not been able to give any attention until to-day. I have read it in my seat, but there have been a number of important amendments made to it here, and it involves important questions. I should be obliged to vote against it if the vote were taken now; but I want to vote for it if I can, or for some bill which will provide for equitable arbitration. Therefore, I do not think we ought now to fix the time for the final vote.

CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, requesting that that part of Department letter of the 6th instant touching the question of withdrawing the civilian employees from the operations of the civil-service act be withdrawn from consideration by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom it was referred on May 9, 1898, and that it be stricken from the official records, and, also, that the clause in the Army appropriation act of March 15, 1898, restricting the expenditures for "compensation of civilians in the Subsistence Department to an amount not exceeding $100,000 for the fiscal year 1899," be suspended during the pendency of the existing war, and that early action be taken thereon; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GEAR. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 12, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

IMMIGRATION BILL.

Mr. DANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration from the Speaker's table, by direction of the Committee on Immigration, the bill S. 112.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to hear.

The SPEAKER. What is the purpose for which the gentleman rises?

Mr. DANFORD. Well, it is to call up from the Speaker's table the bill S. 112 for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of March 3, 1891, in amendment of the immigration and contract-labor acts, be, and hereby is, amended by adding to the classes of aliens thereby excluded from admission to the United States the following:

"All persons physically capable and over 16 years of age who can not read or write the English language or some other language; but a person not so able to read or write who is over 50 years of age and is the parent or grandparent of a qualified immigrant over 21 years of age and capable of supporting such parent or grandparent may accompany such immigrant, or such a parent or grandparent may be sent for and come to join the family of a child or grandchild over 21 years of age similarly qualified and capable, and a wife or minor child not so able to read or write may accompany or be sent for and come to join the husband or parent similarly qualified and capable."

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of testing the ability of the immigrant to read fr write, as required by the foregoing section, the inspection officers shall be ournished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on numbered uniform pasteboard slips, each containing not less than twenty nor more than twenty-five words of said Constitution printed in the various languages of the immigrants in double small pica type. These slips shall be kept in boxes made for that purpose, and so constructed as to conceal the slip from view, each box to contain slips of but one language, and the immigrant may designate the language in which he prefers the test shall be made. Each immigrant shall be required to draw one of said slips from the box and read, or afterwards write out, in full view of the immigration officers, the words printed thereon. Each slip shall be returned to the box immediately after the test is finished, and the contents of the box shall be shaken up by an inspection officer before another drawing is made. No immigrant failing to read or write out the slip thus drawn by him shall be admitted, but he shall be returned to the country from which he came at the expense of the steamship or railroad company which brought him, as now provided by law, and shall also transport with him the wife, children, and other relatives herein mentioned who came with him, if they desire. The inspection officers shall keep in each box at all times a full number of said printed pasteboard slips, and in the case of each excluded immigrant shall keep a certified memorandum of the number of the slip which the said immigrant failed to read or copy out in writing. If in any case, from any unavoidable cause, the foregoing slips are not at hand for use the inspection officers shall carefully and thoroughly test the ability of the immigrant to read or write, using the most appropriate and available means at their command, and shall state fully in writing the reasons why the slips are lacking, and describe the substitute method adopted for testing the ability of the immigrant.

SEC. 3. That this act shall not apply to persons arriving in the United States from any port or place in the Island of Cuba during the continuance of the present disorders there who have heretofore been inhabitants of that island.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect three months after its passage.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman raises the question of consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the question of consideration is raised, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. How is it that this bill, which seems to have passed the Senate some time ago, is still upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. Because it has not been called up by order of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the rule allow a bill coming from the other House to be retained on the Speaker's table; or is it not usual, and is it not the proper practice, to refer it next day to the appropriate committee?

The SPEAKER. Not when the Chair is notified by the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Notified by the committee?

The SPEAKER. Notified by the committee that a similar bill, substantially the same, has had the approval of that committee.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that when a bill substantially the same has been reported by a House committee it is in order to call the bill up from the Speaker's table; but I was not aware that under the practice it could remain on the Speaker's table longer than the following day, as the Speaker's table must be cleared every day.

The SPEAKER. It would remain if no one called it up. It appears——

Mr. BAILEY. If no one called it up, would it not in the usual course of the business go to the committee and have to be reported?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it admitted that a bill similar to this bill has been reported by the House committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was not aware that a similar bill had been reported.

Mr. DANFORD. A similar bill has been reported by the House committee.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And a resolution of the committee passed directing that this bill be called up.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I raise a point of order.

Mr. DANFORD. I want to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Then I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HITT. I ask the gentleman if he will not, before the question of order is presented, yield to me to have an order made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the proceedings ought not to be interrupted by unanimous consent when consideration has already been entered upon.

Mr. HITT. I understood the gentleman to ask consent.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. My point of order is, Mr. Speaker, that the bill which is now upon the Speaker's table, and which it is proposed to call up by the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, is not substantially the same as the bill reported by the Committee on Immigration of the House.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the point of order is made, does that preclude raising the question of consideration after determination of the point of order?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. One further parliamentary inquiry. The parliamentary inquiry I want to make is whether the question of consideration would preclude a motion to refer this bill to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman again state his inquiry?

Mr. RICHARDSON. My inquiry was whether a motion to refer or to commit this bill to the Committee on Immigration could be submitted after the question of consideration had been raised.

The SPEAKER. It should be submitted afterwards.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, Rule XXV, section 2, relating to the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, says:

> But House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in a Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine, as may also Senate bills substantially the same, etc.

My claim is that the Senate bill on the Speaker's table is not substantially the same as the House bill within the meaning of the rule, and can consequently not be called up in this way. The bills relate to the same subject, and I believe were the same when originally introduced in both Houses; but during the consideration in another House the bill now upon the Speaker's table was so materially amended as to take it out of the scope of the rule which I have just cited.

The phrase "substantially the same" means "the same in substance." In other words, bills may differ in phraseology or form, but if they provide for the same thing and are alike in their scope and effect they would come within this rule, no matter how unlike otherwise. But here it is required that they must be the same, not in form, but in substance. This means that their effect must be the same. The scope of the one must neither be more confined nor more extended than that of the other, and the change in existing law effected by the legislation must be the same whether the one is enacted or the other.

The most superficial comparison of the two bills will demonstrate that these conditions would be grossly violated if consideration of the Senate bill were permitted under the terms of Rule XXIV, because they differ widely in substance, as I shall show.

Again, according to Webster, "substantial" means "belonging to substance; real; actually existing." So this bill, in order to permit of its consideration under the rule before cited and without reference to a committee, would have to be really the same as the House bill, and the same provisions must actually exist in the one as in the other.

This is not the case, Mr. Speaker. For proof, permit me to refer to section 3 of the Senate bill. It reads as follows:

> SEC. 3. That this act shall not apply to persons arriving in the United States from any port or place in the Island of Cuba during the continuance of the present disorders there who have heretofore been inhabitants of that island.

This whole section, all important at the present time, is not contained in the House bill at all. Under this section all the illiterate Spaniards in Cuba are exempted from the provisions of this act during the continuance of the present disorders there. It does not say "Cubans," but "persons arriving in the United States from any port or place in the Island of Cuba who have heretofore been inhabitants of that island." Here is a plain discrimination in favor of the Spaniards as against all other nations and all friendly nations of the world. Is this not a material difference between the House and the Senate bill? Will anyone claim, in view of this difference, that the two bills are substantially the same within the meaning of the rule? Why, this difference is as important as the bill itself, if not more so, and is no doubt sufficient to cause many who might otherwise be inclined to support the measure to vote against it or its consideration.

Again, in section 1, line 9, the Senate bill reads: "Who can not read or write." The House bill reads: "Who can not read and write." The difference is only in a word, but will anybody claim that, in the language of the rule, it is not substantial? The one excludes all who can not both read and write; the other excludes only those who can not read or those who can not write. In the immigration figures, that is, in effect, this will make a substantial difference of tens of thousands of persons. I can not, under a point of order, go into the merits of this bill, but I may be permitted to say that I much prefer the Senate bill to the House bill in this respect, and the reason I prefer it is that substantial difference. Were it substantially the same, I would dislike one as much as the other, but this is, as I have said, not the case. There are other important departures of the text of this bill from that of the House bill; the one applies to all persons over 16, the other to persons over 15 years of age; the one requires the immigrant who wants to bring with him or send for his illiterate parents to be over 21 years of age and capable of supporting them; the other contains no such limitation whatever.

The purpose of the rule in question is to facilitate legislation, so that a Senate bill containing practically the same provisions as a House bill may be disposed of more expeditiously. But a brake has been provided in the words "substantially the same" to protect the House against the introduction of matter which is foreign to the bill considered by its committee and which might otherwise slip through without a full knowledge of the House. Bills may differ in form and yet be "substantially the same," but such a material difference in substance as in the present case makes it impossible to dispose of a bill in the way the gentleman from Ohio desires without a plain violation of the rule which I invoke.

I venture the prediction that as soon as the House consents to the consideration of this bill, the gentleman from Ohio will move to substitute the House bill for it, because the latter is much more Draconic in its provisions. This, Mr. Speaker, is another proof that the bills are not "substantially the same," all of which I respectfully submit to the consideration of the Speaker in connection with my point of order.

Mr. DANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what reason the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has for supposing or suspecting that I shall make a motion to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill. The question of the point of order that has just been raised was up some time ago, was considered and talked over by members at the time, and there was some doubt as to whether these bills were, within the meaning of this rule, substantially the same; yet in leaving the Senate bill on the Speaker's table to be called up under this rule there were advantages which overcame those doubts. The bill has been there since.

Now, there are just two propositions. There is a bill for the restriction of illiterate immigrants. It is a bill to keep out of this country persons who are within the objection of section 1. There is no difference between the Senate bill and House bill on that proposition. That is the substance of the measure; it is the matter of the bill. The bill aims at nothing else.

It is true that in section 3 of the Senate bill there is a variation from the House bill in the exclusion of emigrants from the Island of Cuba. That is an objection which was thought of and considered at the time; but it was the opinion of the committee that within the meaning and scope of this rule the Senate bill was a bill for substantially the same purpose as the House bill, and was substantially the same measure.

Now, it is a matter to be considered here whether there is any such substantial deviation of the one bill from the other as to make them two different bills, having a different scope and different purpose. That is a question, of course, for the Speaker, and is one that I do not care to discuss at any very great length.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There is only one suggestion I wish to make. It is that this Senate amendment, applicable to immigrants from Cuba, is to operate only during the difficulties between Spain and this country. It is temporary in its effect.

The SPEAKER. In this case the rule is invoked which permits a committee to call up from the Speaker's table a measure which is "substantially" the same as one already reported by the committee. The object of the restriction is that no committee shall have it in its power to bring before the House a matter of which there has not been sufficient and reasonable notice. In other words, while it was desired under the rules to facilitate legislation, it was also desired that there should be nothing in the nature of a surprise to the House.

This bill having come over from the Senate, the question arising is, therefore, whether it shall be retained on the Speaker's table as being substantially the same as one already reported to the House. In order that it may be so kept upon the table, the Chair must be notified that a committee has passed upon the subject and made a report to the House and asks that the bill be retained on the table for action. The next question to be considered is whether the bill upon the Speaker's table from the Senate is "substantially" the same as the House bill which has been reported. The reason it ought to be substantially the same is that the House may be notified of the subject that is to come up, that it may have due information as to what is to be brought before it, and if it is so informed by a bill having been considered and reported by its committee, that is enough.

The rule does not say that the two measures shall be absolutely the same. It only requires that they shall be "substantially" the same. Now, as the Chair understands, the bill reported to the House provides that only certain persons shall be admitted into this country as immigrants, persons who can read and write or who can pass a certain kind of examination. That is the plan in the House bill and also the plan in the Senate bill. The only difference is that the Senate bill allows for only a limited time and to a limited portion of a foreign community the right to be admitted. It seems to the Chair that the two bills are substantially the same, if any effect is to be given to the word "substantially."

Now, it may be that this proviso is an inopportune and unsuitable proviso, in which case the House can deal with it directly; but the Chair feels constrained to hold that the two bills are substantially the same, providing for the same examination and also for the same exclusion, the only difference being that, owing to what are thought to be peculiar circumstances, a certain set of persons only are to be admitted and for only a limited time. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. MAHANY. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Before the question of consideration is raised, I would like to raise another point of order.

The SPEAKER. One point of order disposes of the whole matter.

The question now is, Shall the House proceed to consider the bill?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DANFORD, Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, and others) there were—ayes 48, noes 90.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Mr. BENNETT, Mr. EVANS, and others. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I think I am entitled first to a vote by tellers.

Mr. GAINES. Does not the gentleman think that we had better be making all of the friends we can now instead of enemies? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, at the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT], I withdraw the demand for tellers, and he withdraws the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BENNETT. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The demand for tellers having been withdrawn, and the demand for yeas and nays withdrawn——

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I did not withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York made the demand. Does the gentleman from Kentucky renew it?

Mr. EVANS. I do.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 27 members only voting in the affirmative on the demand.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-eight members being required under the last vote to call the yeas and nays, the demand is refused. [Applause.]

So the House refused to consider the bill.

REPORT OF LABOR COMMISSIONER.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the House concurrent resolution to print the special report of the Commissioner of Labor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the bill on the subject of immigration will now be referred to the Committee on Immigration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair must consider that question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point of order that it should go to that committee.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is the regular order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Under the ruling of the Chair it is not the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution called up by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS].

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for distribution by the Department of Labor 3,500 additional copies, in cloth binding, of the Second Special Report of the Commissioner of Labor, comprising the labor laws of the United States and of the State and Territorial governments, being a report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, submitted July 20, 1892, and revised and annotated in accordance with concurrent resolution adopted March 5, 1896.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendments to the resolution proposed by the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 8,000 additional copies, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for distribution by the Department of Labor, in cloth binding, of the Second Special Report of the Commissioner of Labor, comprising the labor laws of the United States and of the State and Territorial governments, being a report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, submitted July 20, 1892, and revised and annotated in accordance with concurrent resolution adopted March 5, 1896.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ask unanimous consent of the House to have printed necessary matters before the committee, and under its jurisdiction, within the limit of $500 allowed by the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman should specify on what subject.

Mr. HITT. It is on subjects generally before the committee. This is a matter for their convenience. It is a similar order to that made in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that authority be given to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, within the limit of the rule, to have printed for the convenience of the committee matters now before them for consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, was there not authority given to the committee early in the session for this printing?

Mr. HITT. There was not, I will inform the gentleman from Tennessee. I inquired, and found that it was not done.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I ask to call up the Senate amendments to the Post-Office appropriation bill now on the table, and ask the House to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference between the two Houses on the disagreeing votes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9008) making appropriations for the support of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899.

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the House to nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendments.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, can we not have the amended sections as they will stand if we concur in the Senate amendments read, so that we may understand the effect of the amendments. We can gain nothing practical from the reading of the bill in its present form. It is impossible to determine what the effect of the amendments will be.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that ought to be done.

The Senate amendments were read, with the sections as proposed to be amended.

Mr. LOUD. I ask the House to nonconcur in all the amendments of the Senate and ask for a conference.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, does that not require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I wish to say to the gentleman from California that the reason I ask this question is because the bill has been so thoroughly changed by the Senate that I think we ought to have printed copies of it here, so as to ascertain what has really been done.

Mr. LOUD. I will say that the bill is in print, and the changes are not as many as the gentleman might anticipate, perhaps, from the reading of the bill. I want to say to the gentleman that I do not suppose he is interested in this bill any further than to have the House nonconcur. That is, I assume that the gentleman is opposed to some of the amendments proposed by the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINGS. That is it.

Mr. LOUD. And that is the action that we propose to take, to nonconcur, and the House could do nothing further than perhaps to instruct——

Mr. CUMMINGS. Do I understand that when the conferees report the House will be given an opportunity to vote on the specified amendments?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes.

Mr. CUMMINGS. With that understanding, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no misapprehension on this point, I will state that if the House nonconcur generally in these amendments and ask for a conference they will have no opportunity to vote upon each separate amendment. The conferees' report will have to be acted upon as an entirety—must be either accepted or rejected as a whole.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I simply wish to state that I am opposed to the amendment of the Senate striking out the appropriation for free rural delivery and also to the amendment reducing the number of deliveries in large cities to four.

Mr. DOCKERY. And you want those amendments brought back for action by the House.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. We want to have a separate vote on those amendments.

Mr. LOUD. Now, one moment. Supposing the Senate recedes upon these amendments, do you want any vote upon that?

Mr. SULZER. No.

Mr. LOUD. What can the House do in this instance except to nonconcur?

Mr. SULZER. I ask the House to nonconcur.

Mr. LOUD. That is what I am asking. I am asking the House to nonconcur.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I understand from what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has said that we shall have no opportunity whatever to test the sense of the House on these amendments if the conferees should report the bill back with the Senate amendments included.

Mr. LOUD. Let me say to the gentleman that the only power the House would have now would be to accept the amendments of the Senate or instruct the committee on conference to insist. Now, I ask that we nonconcur.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will allow an interruption, would it not strengthen the position of the House conferees if the House should positively determine upon these two propositions for this reason? In conference the Senate conferees will say, "The Senate has acted, but the House has not acted upon these propositions, because they were not especially before the House." Now, would it not strengthen his position if we, on the part of the House, should declare against these particular amendments?

Mr. LOUD. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think it would be necessary——

Mr. BINGHAM. I know the gentleman's position. I want the position of the House.

Mr. LOUD. Would it not be rather unprecedented to adopt that plan?

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think such action as that would be premature at this time.

The SPEAKER. The first conference is usually a free conference.

Mr. MOODY. I should like to ask the gentleman from California if he has any objection to assuring the House that upon these two amendments the House shall have a vote not embarrassed by the consideration of the conference report as a whole, so that we may at some time vote specifically and directly upon these propositions?

Mr. BROMWELL. If it becomes necessary.

Mr. MOODY. If it becomes necessary.

Mr. LOUD. There is no assurance or agreement that I could give the gentleman that would give him any right that he does not now enjoy.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I have suggested to the gentleman from California that if the House were assured that, so far as the gentleman himself was concerned (which we will accept as a sufficient assurance), the House should be guaranteed a vote on these two amendments everybody would be content to let the matter take the usual course. I understand the only thing we can do now is what the gentleman from California suggests—to nonconcur; but I believe it would be agreeable to all of us if we could be assured that when the bill comes back from conference, if there was any necessity for it, the House should have a vote, without being embarrassed with the consideration of other questions contained in the report; and the House will be content with the assurance of the gentleman from California that we should be allowed a separate vote on those two amendments.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to the gentleman again that there is nothing that I can assure the gentleman of or concede to him that he does not already have, and no action of mine and no assurance of mine can give the gentleman any more rights than he already has.

Mr. MOODY. But the assurances of the gentleman from California, while they would give us no additional rights, would give a feeling of comfort in the belief that we would have at some time a chance to vote in the House separately on these two amendments.

Mr. LOUD. Let me present the position to the gentleman. When we come back to the House with a report, if the House does not accept the report the House can instruct the committee.

Mr. MOODY. But the report comes back, and it must either be accepted or rejected as a whole. Now, there may be some members upon the floor who have in that report some questions in which they are vitally interested, and desire to have the report accepted for that reason. They may also have a feeling upon these two questions, and may desire to have the report rejected because it is not satisfactory on the question of free delivery; and the difficulty is that they have disadvantages either way they make up their minds. What I should like to have is a chance to have a separate, distinct, and direct vote in the House on those propositions before they are agreed to.

Mr. LOUD. I can not make a concession to the gentleman, because it would belong to him of right. I can not prevent him having that right, and nothing that I could concede would give him a right that he has not already.

Mr. MOODY. We would be satisfied with the gentleman's assurance that he would do his best.

Mr. LOUD. I have no hesitation in saying that, so far as I am concerned, the House shall have opportunity given to it now and at every other stage to determine what it desires, clear to the conclusion of the consideration.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, in disputes between the two Houses there is a proper courtesy to be observed. When one House asks the other House for a free conference, and then pledges members of that conference, before going into the conference, what they will do, it is not part of the courtesy that should obtain between the two Houses. You might as well say that you would not have any conference with them at all.

Mr. PITNEY. If the gentleman from California will permit me, it is quite a common thing for conferees on the part of the House to be met with the statement on the part of the Senate conferees that they can not agree as to a certain proposition desired by the House without first submitting it to the Senate. It is also a common practice for House conferees to say that they can not consent to such and such a Senate amendment until they shall first have a separate vote upon it in the House. Now, I ask the gentleman if he will not assure us that these two Senate amendments—with respect to rural free delivery and city free delivery—shall not be agreed to nor embodied in a conference report until after the gentleman has first submitted them to a separate vote in the House.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think it would be proper for me, if I were one of the conferees, to make any agreement at present as to what I should not agree to in the conference, but I do want to say this, that we will do all in our power to protect the rights and wishes of the House. Further than that I do not think the conferees ever should be asked.

Mr. BINGHAM. I believe this matter can be left wholly with the chairman. He has had long experience on conference reports, and we can trust the chairman of the committee to give the House every opportunity for action should it reach the necessity in that stage.

Mr. MOODY. The assurance of the gentleman from California satisfies me.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from California this question: If his motion prevails, is it not within the power of the House conferees to agree to both the Senate amendments, and then report back the whole bill as amended? The House will then have only the option to refuse the bill as amended or accept it, leaving them without a separate vote on the two specific amendments.

Mr. LOUD. I will say, in reply to the gentleman, that after the rejection of the conference report the House would undoubtedly have an opportunity to instruct the conferees.

Mr. SULZER. If the House should not reject the conference report, we can not instruct.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Of course; the House would then acquiesce.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, understanding that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is satisfied with the explanation of the gentleman from California, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is objection renewed?

Mr. LOUD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement, and see——

Mr. BROMWELL. Was I not recognized?

The SPEAKER (to Mr. MAXWELL). The gentleman from Ohio will first be recognized.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this objection is entirely unnecessary, and should not take the time of the House for this reason. Suppose, for instance, that our committee of conference when they go into conference with the Senate committee yield on these two propositions which seem to be exciting this discussion. They come back with their report from the conference stating that they have consented to these amendments of the Senate. All we have to do then is to vote down the conference report, and then instruct the new conferees appointed to insist upon disagreement to these two Senate amendments.

Now, on the other hand, if they come back with a report that they have not consented to the Senate amendments, then all the House has to do is to insist on the nonconcurrence. It seems to me it is entirely within our hands, and the mere fact that there are these two provisions that we are objecting to, and others that we are in favor of, does not place this bill in any different position from hundreds of other bills that have gone into conference. We reject the whole report and that instructs our conferees to demand a nonconcurrence in the two Senate amendments to which we object particularly. The matter is wholly within our control and the control of the gentlemen to be appointed on the conference committee.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, there are several distinct propositions, or amendments, that have been submitted by the Senate to the House, and to some of those the House evidently will not object. Now, as I understand, those to which the House will not object ought not to be certified back to the Senate as being nonconcurred in. It seems to me the several amendments should be taken up seriatim, and acted upon by the House, and such as we do not concur in, if there should be any, should be so certified back to the Senate. But the House evidently will concur in some of the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to insist on a separate vote upon the amendments.

Mr. MAXWELL. Very well, Mr. Speaker; I call for a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is now, Shall the matter be before the House for consideration? If there be no objection, the question will be upon concurring in the first amendment. Does the gentleman request a separate vote on each amendment?

Mr. MAXWELL. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read the first amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] if there is any provision in this bill authorizing the Postmaster-General to expend any sum for the payment of clerk hire in the second, third, and fourth class offices?

Mr. LOUD. The Senate struck out that provision. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the House to nonconcur in all the amendments except those that it may be suggested that the House concur in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MAXWELL] has asked for a separate vote on each amendment. The question is on nonconcurring in the first amendment.

The first amendment was nonconcurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the second amendment.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, as the bill has not been printed, nor the amendments, there seems to be some confusion in regard to the amendments, and I will withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska withdraws his request for a vote on the separate amendments. The question now is on nonconcurring in all of the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were nonconcurred in; and the motion that the House ask for a conference was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from the Postmaster-General in reference to the deliveries and collections in the three cities of New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LOVE. Is it on this subject?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that it is on the subject of deliveries and collections in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago.

Mr. LOUD. I think the gentleman had better give it to the conference committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think it had better go into the RECORD, because it is a matter of instruction all around.

The request of Mr. BINGHAM was agreed to.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 10, 1898.

SIR: Complying with your request of the 8th instant, I have the honor to furnish the following information in regard to the number of deliveries, collections, etc., in New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia:

New York	1,420	2 to 9	2 to 39	447	2,292
Chicago	1,148	3 to 6	6 to 18	318	2,730
Philadelphia	804	1 to 7	1 to 17	298	3,217

Also statement showing the number of pieces of first-class mail collected daily from street letter boxes and the weight of first-class mail delivered daily per carrier at the above-named offices:

It is estimated that 40 per cent of the amount of mail collected from street letter boxes at these offices is for local delivery.

Very respectfully,

CH. EMORY SMITH,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. H. H. BINGHAM,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LOUD, Mr. SMITH of Illinois, and Mr. SWANSON.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask whether it would be in order to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider a bill for the raising of revenue, an amendment to the customs administration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be in order.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman from New York yield a moment? I would like to ask unanimous consent that the Post-Office bill be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the Post-Office bill be printed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of revenue bills.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is that permissible after a call for the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

The motion of Mr. PAYNE was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (with Mr. HEPBURN in the chair) for the consideration of revenue bills.

ABANDONED IMPORTED MERCHANDISE.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (S. 3132) to provide for the disposition of abandoned imported merchandise.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 23 of the act of June 10, 1890, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 23. That no allowance for damage to goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States shall hereafter be made in the estimation and liquidation of duties thereon; but the importer thereof may, within ten days after entry, abandon to the United States all or any portion of goods, wares, and merchandise included in any invoice, and be relieved from the payment of the duties on the portion so abandoned: Provided, That the portion so abandoned shall amount to 10 per cent or over of the total value or quantity of the invoice; and the property so abandoned shall be sold by public auction or otherwise disposed of for the account and credit of the United States under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. All merchandise so abandoned by the importer thereof shall be delivered by such importer at such place within the port of arrival as the chief officer of customs may direct, and on the failure of the importer to comply with the directions of the collector in this respect the abandoned merchandise shall be disposed of by the collector at the expense of such importer."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes an amendment to section 23 of what is known as the customs-administration act. The present act provides that the owner of imported merchandise may abandon what are known as samples, which are handed over to the customs department, and that these samples may be sold at public auction and the money turned into the Treasury. According to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury it sometimes happens that goods are abandoned which are worthless, such as decayed fruit and vegetable matter, and the Government is compelled, at its own expense, to remove them on account of the quarantine regulations or the regulations of the health department of the port. No provision is made in the present law for allowing the Government to collect this expense from the importers of the goods. This bill seeks simply to add at the end of section 23 these words:

All merchandise so abandoned by the importer thereof shall be delivered by such importer at such place within the port of arrival as the chief officer of customs may direct, and on the failure of the importer to comply with the directions of the collector in this respect the abandoned merchandise shall be disposed of by the collector at the expense of such importer.

Mr. Chairman, unless there is a desire on the part of some gentleman to debate the bill (which is a Senate bill), I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the general statute provide the machinery by which this money shall be collected from the importer?

Mr. PAYNE. It does not. This bill simply gives the Government the right to collect the money.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And when you give the Government under this bill the right to collect you do not provide any machinery for that purpose?

Mr. PAYNE. We have already the machinery of the courts. This legislation will create the liability.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Government will have to go into court to sue?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly, unless the importer pays voluntarily.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion of Mr. PAYNE was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SHERMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HEPBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (S. 3182) to provide for the disposition of abandoned imported merchandise, and had directed him to report the same back with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CORLISS. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan demands the regular order, which is the call of committees.

Several committees were called.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, was the Committee on Labor called?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not see the chairman of that committee in the House. I believe he desired to call up a bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think that committee has a bill to call up.

Mr. DALZELL. I ask that the committee may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]?

Mr. HOPKINS. I think I shall have to object.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The bill which that committee desires to call up is the eight-hour bill. I think the gentleman had better not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made, and the call will continue.

Mr. CORLISS (when the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress was called). I am directed by the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress to call up a joint resolution now on the House Calendar and reported by our committee——

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to withdraw my objection to passing over the Committee on Labor. I misunderstood the proposition.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. CORLISS. I call up the joint resolution (H. Res. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

Mr. DALZELL. Will not the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] yield for a moment?

Mr. CORLISS. I will do so provided I can have the floor again.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman yields, I desire to say that when I raised objection to passing over the Committee on Labor I did so under a misapprehension. I now desire to withdraw my objection. The proposition was to pass that committee over without prejudice.

Mr. CORLISS. If that can be done without taking any time, I do not object.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Committee on Labor will be considered as having been passed without prejudice.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIDSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask the same privilege with reference to the Committee on Patents, that it may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY THE PEOPLE.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I now call up for present consideration the joint resolution (H. Res. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendments be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall become and be a part of the Constitution, namely: In lieu of the first and second paragraphs of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States of America the following shall be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. These Senators shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States unless the people of any State, either through their legislature or by the constitution of the State, shall provide for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people; then, in such case, United States Senators shall be elected in such State at large by direct vote of the people; a plurality shall elect, and the electors shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

"When vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, in the representation of any State in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the next general election, in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State."

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration on this resolution.

The question was taken; and the House decided to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed on an examination of the proposed amendment to the Constitution that the only change contemplated is in paragraphs 1 and 2 of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution. Paragraph 1 is changed by striking out the words:

Chosen by the legislature thereof.

And inserting the following at the end of the paragraph:

These Senators shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States, unless the people of any State, either through their legislature or by the Constitution of the State, shall provide for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. A plurality shall elect, and the electors shall have the qualifications requisite for electors for the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

Paragraph 4 is amended so as to permit the State to provide for filling vacancies, either by an election by the people or temporary appointment by the executive.

The first section of the Constitution vests all legislative powers in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

The important and superior power of the House is manifested not only by the second section, defining the character and qualification of the members of the House, but by other provisions limiting the power of originating measures for raising revenue to the House of Representatives.

The destiny of a nation must depend upon the character and intelligence of its people.

Human affairs, and in fact all created things, are subject to the ever-changing vicissitudes of time and the evolutions of nature.

With the hundred years that have elapsed since the adoption of the national Constitution wonderful changes have occurred in our political and material conditions.

From a meager population of 3,000,000 scattered along the Atlantic coast, principally engaged in agricultural pursuits, we have now become a rich, powerful, and growing nation of over 70,000,000 of people, engaged in all the activities of industrial and commercial enterprise known to civilization.

American schools and newspapers have educated our people into wonderful mental and business activity, while the genius and industry of our people have increased their capacity for business pursuits beyond that of any other race of men.

In the days of the founders of the Constitution any communication or association between the people of different States was of rare occurrence.

To-day every important act in the political, social, industrial, and commercial affairs of the people, through the genius of man and the utilization of the forces of nature, is daily disseminated and made known to the people throughout the length and breadth of the land.

At the time when the facilities for knowing the feelings and will of the people were very primitive the fear that some might still retain a spirit of loyalty to England and regard the Republic as an experiment inspired some of the framers of our Constitution with apprehension of danger from too great power in the hands of the people.

In those days the great wealth was scattered among all the people and the corrupt use of wealth and power by the few was unknown, while to-day the gregarious instinct of man seems to permeate every avenue of human life, threatening the welfare and suppressing the voice and will of the people.

While I share in the patriotic sentiment which is prompt to challenge every proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, I sincerely believe that this amendment to this truly wonderful instrument is necessary to meet the exigencies of the nation and preserve more perfectly the liberties of the people.

The settled conviction of time and experience that the Constitution as a whole is good and wise has our heartiest approval, but devotion to the Constitution should stimulate us with a desire to repair the few parts which have not insured to the people every reasonable liberty.

The man who would boldly seek to alter it so as to remedy its defects is a better friend of the Constitution than he who blindly defends its faults. [Applause.]

The principle upon which our forefathers evidently intended to base the constitutional fabric of our country is manifested by the creation of two branches of Congress—the House, composed of members elected by the popular vote of each Congressional district, in which the voice and will of the people, without regard to State lines, finds expression and action, and the Senate, the representative of the State as a political unit. One represents the people and the other the sovereignty of the State.

Our forefathers evidently intended the Senate of the United States to be the conservative branch or balance wheel of our Government, and for over half a century it seems to have maintained this dignified and conservative position.

In the debates of the Congress of the Confederation there was a diversity of opinion among the great men upon this important question. In this discussion Madison of Virginia earnestly advocated the system of election by the people, and declared that he "thought the great fabric to be raised would be more stable and durable if it should rest on the solid foundation of the people itself than if it should stand merely on the pillars of the legislature;" and Mr. James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, in advocating this principle, said:

> I am in favor of raising the Federal pyramid to a considerable altitude, and for that reason I wish to give it as broad a base as possible. No government can long subsist without the confidence of the people.

In the first hundred years of our national life our people were actively occupied in the development of our boundless natural resources, the cultivation of our fruitful soil, and the extension and perfection of our natural industries, and in the rapid growth and expansion of our nation we attracted the best physical, moral, and intellectual men and women of all the Saxon and Celtic races, and in the amalgamation of these noble races of men there has been developed the most ingenious, intelligent, and industrious people of the civilized world.

In my judgment the enlightenment of the people, the liberty of our public institutions, and the prosperity of our people and nation are largely due to the association of the best blood and character of all nations. But in this rapid transit of human affairs, the unveiling of our great natural resources, and the construction and operation of our vast highways of traffic there have been rapidly accumulated gigantic fortunes in the hands of the few and the aggregation of capital in corporate and trust powers that threaten the welfare and happiness of the people.

We are reminded of the prophetic words of our martyred President Lincoln, who warned us "to beware of the money power, which seeks to perpetuate its reign until the wealth of the country has passed into the hands of the few and the nation is lost."

Wealth is power, and it is but natural for the man who possesses the ability to accumulate a vast fortune to be inspired with an ambition to achieve the honor, power, and dignity of a Senatorship.

There is an impression among the people that many seats in the United States Senate have been secured by the corrupt use of money or corporate influence, and it has been said that it is as difficult for a poor man to enter the Senate of the United States as for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. [Laughter.]

The chief concern of all good governments is the welfare and happiness of the people, and I believe their happiness and welfare can best be secured and preserved through the agency of the direct action of the citizen as the sovereign. [Applause.]

The fundamental principle of a republican form of government is based upon the idea that they derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The fathers of this Republic founded our Government upon the sovereign power and will of the people, and in its triumphant march it has spread the spirit of liberty over the Western Hemisphere, crossed the Atlantic, dethroned kings, and destroyed monarchies, and out of their wrecks and ruins have been builded governments of the people, for the people, and by the people.

If the people have the wisdom in our several States to elect our governors, judges, and State officers through the primaries and conventions of the parties, why have they not the wisdom to elect our Senators? [Applause.]

Had the people of Kentucky, Oregon, and many other States where Senators have recently been elected enjoyed the rights insured by the proposed amendment, the disgrace of those States, and the humiliation of the nation by the deplorable conduct of the members of such State legislatures, would have been avoided.

Vacancies in the Senate, in consequence of the imperfection in the Constitution which we now seek to remedy, are most frequent.

The time and attention of the Senate has recently been occupied with the constitutional right of the governor to fill such vacancies, and it has been determined, following numerous precedents, that such vacancies can not be filled after the legislature has failed to exercise the prerogative imposed upon it by the Constitution.

The framers of our Constitution did not intend to permit vacancies to exist in the Senate. Otherwise the unit of the State could not be expressed; but, unfortunately, through intrigue and political maneuvers, this constitutional right has been denied to many States during the history of our country.

The evil effects of the election of Senators by the legislatures was fully illustrated by the last legislature of the State of Oregon, where the intrigues of the ambitious candidates for the Senatorship not only prevented the legislature from making their choice for Senator, but prevented any action by the legislature in the interest of the people of the State.

A leading paper of this city on March 1 editorially commented upon this case in the following language:

> The Senate's action in refusing to seat Mr. Corbett, of Oregon, will meet with popular approval. The decision rests upon broad grounds, which the country will be able easily to understand.
> The Oregon legislature, charged with the duty of electing a United States Senator for a full term, met, but failed to discharge that or any other duty devolving upon it. The whole time allotted for the session was consumed in partisan maneuvering for partisan advantage. There was the semblance of an organization effected, but only a semblance. The legitimacy of the action was disputed. The interests of the State were neglected by the State's own representatives, and at last failure was confessed by the dispersion of the legislature and the return of the members to their homes.

Many cases might be cited to illustrate the evil effects of the present methods for the election of Senators. The prophetic words of Senator Conkling in discussing the right of a governor to fill vacancies where the legislature fails to elect are applicable and have already come true:

> That the governor of a State and his friends, by cabal, intrigue, and maneuver, may so arrange that the legislature will decide not to elect, or would fail to elect, in order that the governor might gather to himself the power to fill the vacancy.

With the adoption of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, it would be impossible to defeat the will of the people in any election. The vacancies that are now too frequent in the Senate, and occupy the time and attention of that body, would never occur, and the all-important influence and power of the respective States in the exercise of their constitutional prerogatives as a unit would be maintained.

The importance of this amendment and the potent influence of the direct vote of the people have just been fully illustrated and exemplified in the State of Ohio, where the gallant leader of the Republican party in its triumphant march to victory in 1896 defeated the combined forces of the enemies of and traitors in the Republican party.

Many of the States have already taken action upon this amendment and adopted resolutions urging upon Congress the favorable consideration thereof. Such resolutions have been adopted by the legislatures of the States of California, Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, Ohio, Utah, and Wyoming.

I am aware that this is not the first proposition that has been considered by this House looking to the remedy proposed, but it is the first time that an amendment has been suggested providing for the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people at the option of the people of the State, and I rejoice to learn that many of our Senators are listening to the voice of the people and yielding to the demands that are being made in behalf of this amendment. I was delighted to hear the following expression from the senior Senator of my own State in a recent discussion of the question with reference to the election of a Senator from Oregon:

> I do not believe the Senate will sanction such a doctrine or put its stamp of approval upon this transaction. If it shall, the disaster, appalling as it will be, will bear its bitter fruits not many years, for the people of this country, without regard to party, will then demand that the Constitution of the United States shall be so amended as to take from the legislature the power to elect Senators and place it in the hands of the people, where, in my judgment, it rightfully belongs, and thus thwart the machinations of designing men and preserve the principles of representative government in this body.

In the election of United States Senators by the legislature corruption can not well be detected or proven.

In many States the members of the legislatures seek the office for the express purpose of electing a Senator.

The power of a legislature expires with the session in which the Senator is elected and the people are deprived of the power to discover, punish, or condemn the corrupt conduct of its members.

Through party organizations, party primaries, party conventions, and party platforms are formed the principles by which each administration of State and national affairs are governed.

The progress of the State and nation, the welfare and happiness of the people must be achieved through and by the sovereign power and voice of the people.

"Lead us not into temptation," says the Lord's Prayer; yet the Constitution in its present form spreads in the pathway of members of the legislature a moral temptation through which many true men of merit are often forced to defeat and the glory and honor of a Senatorship snatched by unfair means from the hands of the people.

Take from the legislature the selection of United States Senators, and you will destroy one of the most potent powers through which corporate influence now holds its sway.

Give the people the right proposed by this amendment and you will once more restore the United States Senate to the dignified position intended by the fathers of our country, and remove the influence that now threatens the confidence of the people.

Why should anyone oppose this amendment? Is there a member of Congress who is unwilling or afraid to submit his record or political ambitions to a vote of the people? If the Senators can not trust the people, how can it be expected that the people will have confidence in the Senate?

Any man who seeks a Senatorship by honorable means and for patriotic purposes; every man who believes in a republican form of government of the people, for the people, and by the people; every man who has confidence in the sound judgment and integrity of the American people; every man who believes in preserving the sovereignty in the hands of the citizen, will favor this amendment. [Applause.]

Unfortunately, in recent years the election of a United States Senator by the State legislatures has been usually followed by resolutions of investigation into the methods and alleged corruption in connection with such election. Such investigations are usually inaugurated upon resolutions quite unanimously adopted for the appointment of committees of investigation, but unfortunately for our country, such investigations universally result in effectively concealing the facts and exonerating the participants by a calcimine of resolutions.

In the construction of our constitutional fabric our forefathers intended that the Senate of the United States should be the conservative branch of our Government, but, unfortunately, in the evolution of human affairs, it is the branch upon which the people now look with distrust and fear. The establishment of business methods in this House, and the victory of the present Speaker in the transformation of a chaotic organization with filibustering tactics into an intelligent working force, in which the will of the majority finds useful power for the enactment of wise legislation, is a matter of universal rejoicing by the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

To-day this House is the conservative branch of Congress, and the eyes of the business men, in whose hands the financial interests of this country are held, and the hearts of the people are fortunately turned with confidence to this body for safety and protection against the visionary theories and unwise legislation threatened by the Senate.

Before entering upon the new century let us repair the imperfections in our constitutional fabric and bring the United States Senate in closer touch with the people, preserving the unit of power in the State, and thereby restore it to the dignified and conservative position intended by the framers of our Constitution, and with the strength of the wisdom, genius, and industry of our people and confidence in every branch of our Government, move onward and upward in our triumphant march to national honor and greatness. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, is this joint resolution open to amendment at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to offer an amendment, then, to strike out all in the resolution on page 2, line 15, after the word "these," and down to the word "elected," in line 20. Also strike out the words, in lines 20 and 21, "in such State."

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow me a moment to ask consent to take from the table a Senate bill to have a conference committee appointed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This will take only a moment. I do not propose to make a speech upon it. I only submit this amendment and desire to make a few remarks.

My reason, Mr. Speaker, for offering the amendment is that it will make the election of Senators by the people absolute instead of leaving the question indefinite, as now provided. This resolution leaves it optional with the States whether to elect Senators by the people or to elect them by the legislatures. Now, in the States where the election of Senators by the people is most necessary, it will doubtless be found that it will be as difficult to secure an election by the people as it is now, and the Senators would not be elected by the people but by the legislatures, under the option that is given in the present resolution.

I therefore offer the amendment for the purpose of correcting what I think to be a mistake.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. Is the gentleman not aware of the fact that that proposition was submitted by the Fifty-third Congress and it was defeated because of the restrictions the gentleman provides?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that I am well aware of the fact that this measure, just as I have suggested, was sent by the House to the Senate in the Fifty-third Congress, and was defeated there. But since the membership of the House represents the wishes of the people of the country, and it is the wish of the people of the United States that the Senators should be elected by the people themselves, I think that the bill sent to the Senate should give ample expression to the wishes of the people and not what the Senate wishes.

Now, of course, if the Senate puts an amendment of this kind on the bill, I do not say that I would not vote for the measure, because even in that form it would be a great improvement on the present method.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. CORLISS. Your proposition attempts to say to the people of the several States, arbitrarily, what they should do. Speaking for the people of your State, you attempt to say what the people of my State shall submit to. My proposition is to let the people of my State and your State and every other State express their will through their votes, and not be dictated to by Congress or the people of any other State, leaving each State separate and distinct as a unit in the United States Senate, as was intended by the fathers of our country. For that reason I sincerely trust the gentleman will not insist upon his amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that there is no one on the floor of this House who more desires than I do that the people of each State shall, on most questions, have the right to express their own individual will; but it is for the very reason that legislation which the people of the United States desire is often defeated because the representatives are not selected by the votes of the people that I think the amendment should be adopted. The danger is not from that class of States that will agree to this resolution. Those States to-day have men representing them in the halls of Congress who were selected by the people; not directly, but they voice the sentiments of the people.

But an amendment of this kind is intended to remedy the evil in States where machine rule and corrupt government have reached a point where the will of the people is no longer expressed and where they can not control the legislature; and it is as much to the interest of the people of my State to have the representatives in the United States Senate from other States men who will voice the sentiments of the people, whose hearts are in touch with the people on points of legislation, as it is to have such Senators from my own State. Therefore I say that when we come to ask for an amendment of this kind, to write a change in the fundamental principles of the law of this country, we ought to put a provision in the law which goes to the direct point and require a uniform system of election of Senators by the people in every State in the Union.

Of course, if the Senate will not agree to it, and send it back to us with an amendment similar to the provisions of the gentleman's bill, why, then we might accept it as the best we could get; but when it leaves this House, I say it ought to go there voicing what the people of this country want, and I therefore insist on my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "those," in line 15, page 2, down to and including the word "case," in line 20.

Also, strike out the words "in such State," in lines 20 and 21 of page 2.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. CORLISS. It seems to me this is very unwise. If the people of a State are to have a right to express their views, the method by which they accomplish that should, if possible, be left within their own control. A State where Senators are now elected by the members of the legislature may desire to continue that plan. The proposition of the gentleman compels them against their will to change that method. You attempt to force the adoption of a plan to secure which you must have the ratification of three-fourths of the States. Now, many States are willing that my State shall have a right to elect its Senators by the people, but they may prefer to reserve in their own State the right of election by the legislature. They would not vote for this constitutional amendment if you deprived them of this right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman have any fear that any amendment to the Constitution along this line that can be passed through the Senate will fail of ratification by the people of the several States?

Mr. CORLISS. I will say to the gentleman that I do feel apprehensive that it would be impossible to secure a sufficient number of the State legislatures to ratify this amendment, if the gentleman's amendment is adopted. I am confident that it would be almost unanimous, if the resolution proposed by the committee is adopted, because the people of one State are willing that the people of another State shall express their choice in any manner that the people of that State may desire. By your amendment you propose to compel the people of my State to vote direct, whether they desire to do so or not. I submit that the amendment is very unwise, and will defeat the thing which is desired by the people.

Mr. GARDNER. One way or another is the right way.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] if this is not the result that would grow out of the adoption of this amendment:

These Senators shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States unless the people of any State, either through their legislature or by the constitution of the State, shall provide for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

Now, what I ask is this: The legislature of the State of Michigan, I will say, to-day wants the Senators elected by the people. After a while, when a particular legislature comes in, they discover that they have a little better scheme, for the sole purpose of electing the Senator by the legislature; and they turn in and repeal the law on the first day of the session that was passed at a previous session, and take to themselves a power that they would not have had they not repealed the law that allowed the people to choose Senators. It seems to me there ought to be no power given to a legislature to thus interfere with conditions; and when we propose to vote for an amendment to the Constitution, I would certainly make it uniform throughout every State of the Union, and place it beyond the power of the legislatures to handle it as a football of political appliances. It seems to me that if there is no answer to this, that if this is to be left in the power of the legislatures of the States, it is worse than the present condition has ever been described to be.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. ARNOLD. Is it not within the province of the legislature to submit that proposition to make it a part of the fundamental law of each State, so that you are in the hands of the legislature in any event?

Mr. GROSVENOR. But here is the trouble: This provision makes it an act of the legislature without submission to the people.

Mr. ARNOLD. Your proposition is to make it a part of the fundamental law of each State.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not say that I will vote for it in any event; but I do say that if it is to be a part of the practice of the various States, it ought to be absolutely uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. ARNOLD. One further question. If that legislative provision were stricken out of the bill, would not it practically be defeated in the various States?

Mr. GARDNER. Then they do not want it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If that is so, they do not want it. Then the argument is that the States want a condition so that they can play with it as a political shuttlecock and battledore; that one Senator may be elected by the people, and the next time the legislature can conclude they will not continue that practice, and they will repeal the law and elect the Senator themselves. And so you bring about a worse condition of things than at present, which is certainly bad enough.

Mr. SULZER. I am very glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio make that admission.

Mr. CORLISS. The gentleman from Ohio propounded a question to me. He asked me whether or not this would not permit the legislature of a State to change the plan from time to time. The gentleman is aware that a State legislature can not take action except with the consent of the governor, who is elected by the people.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is proceeding on the idea that in all the States there is a veto power. In many States the veto power is only a nominal one, and a bill may be passed over the veto by a majority. In my own State there is no veto power and has never been.

Mr. CORLISS. How long would such a legislature stand before the people——

Mr. GROSVENOR. They would stand until they elected a Senator.

Mr. CORLISS (continuing). After taking such action? The members would be impeached; the legislature would be abandoned and driven from business if they should undertake to rob the people in that way. If we once adopt this measure, do you suppose that any legislature thereafter would take the power from the people again? The idea is absurd. The proposition would not be considered for a moment. When the people once receive the right and have the power to elect a United States Senator directly through the Constitution or through the legislature, no power will ever take it from them; and no legislature would ever dare attempt to exercise such a power.

Now, I desire again to say that the proposition of the gentleman means danger to this measure, as many of the States would not adopt it and many Senators would not vote for it. They would be compelled to vote for it if it is left to the option of the people to elect them. They would have to submit to their people and not to the people of the gentleman's State or any other State. When you submit to a Senator of the United States a proposition that his people ask for this, and when he goes before his people and either reserves the power in the legislature or gives it to them, what Senator of the United States would dare to stand up and vote against this amendment to the Constitution?

I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio, who loyally supported the leader of the Republican party in the last election to the United States Senate, he would not to-day be honored if you had not submitted to the people the proposition that this constitutional amendment gives to that State. I am able to state that the people of the State of Ohio have adopted resolutions asking members of Congress to vote for this amendment. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment in the form in which it is proposed is a safe one. I am perfectly willing to adopt the gentleman's amendment, so far as my own views are concerned, if the States would only agree to it, and if the Senate would agree to it I would be satisfied. But that has been tried. Senators would not dare to vote against this amendment as I propose to submit it, and the people would at once ratify it, whether they believed the legislature should have the power or the people.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to agree to the resolution as it stands, while I would be glad to have the provision suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama; but I very much fear that if we submitted to the various States of this Union a proposition asking that two-thirds of them consent to an arbitrary change in the method of electing our United States Senators——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Three-fourths.

Mr. RIDGELY. Three-fourths, I should have said—that the whole thing would fail, and no State in this Union would be permitted by a change of the Constitution to elect a single Senator by the popular vote of their own citizens.

Therefore, I believe it is far safer that we shall pass this resolution in the form it has been offered, without the amendment, and thereby gain to the States the privilege of regulating for themselves, either by the constitution of the State or by enactment of the State legislatures, so that the people of the States so desiring can elect the members of the United States Senate by popular vote. Believing it is far safer to submit an amendment to the Constitution by ratification of three-quarters of the States in the form it now stands, I am opposed to the amendment, fearing it will defeat the whole thing.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the chairman of the committee if he will object to amending the bill so as to conform to the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] by striking out in line 17, page 2, after the word "State," the words "either through their legislature or;" so that it will read, "the people of any State by the constitution of the State."

Mr. CORLISS. I am willing to adopt the suggestion proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island. If he will make a motion to that effect, I will gladly consent to it. It will then leave the absolute power in the constitution of the State.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 17, after the word "State," strike out the words "either through their legislature or;" so that it will read, "the people of any State by the constitution of the State."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, is this an amendment to the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that my amendment strikes out the entire provision, and therefore this amendment would not be in order unless it is offered as a substitute.

Mr. CAPRON. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama if he will not withdraw his amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The difficulty is that what the gentleman seeks to accomplish by his amendment does not accomplish what I desire to reach by my amendment, and that is to make it mandatory that the United States Senators shall be elected by the people in all the States by the same method. The amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island would leave it optional with the different States to determine that question.

Mr. CORLISS. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Rhode Island withdraw his amendment until after we can have a vote upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me in an important and solemn matter like amending the Federal Constitution great care should be exercised that we have the letter of the text carry out the real purpose of the legislative mind. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I think all members will agree that in the make-up of the Congress the Federal Constitution should make every provision necessary in the election of members, and that the State constitution and the State legislature should be entirely silent on that subject. We give to the States the right to provide for the election of their own State legislatures, without any interference on the part of the General Government.

Under our system of dual government it seems to me the same reasoning that compels us to accord to the States the right of electing their own legislatures in their own way should give to the Federal Government the exclusive right to provide for the election of its representative body in its own way, and that the provision for the election of members of Congress, both of the House and of the Senate, should be uniform through all the States; that you should not have in Maine one method of election and in Vermont another, but in all the forty-five States the same procedure should be provided in the Federal Constitution for the election of Senators and Members of the House without any deviation whatever.

Now, then, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], while I do not like to disagree with the chairman of the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, strikes me to be exactly in the right direction. It makes a uniform procedure all through the United States. Alabama must elect its Senators in the same way Vermont does, and there is no reason why she should not. We are providing a scheme for the election of our own members in this House and in the Senate. Now, then, why should one State have one method and another State another?

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the crying evil to-day that calls for the enactment of a constitutional amendment is the very fact that the legislatures of the States have proved themselves, in many instances, to be entirely unfitted and unworthy in the election of Senators. If you are to leave the option to some of the States to elect their Senators by the legislature, you are going to perpetuate the very evil you are seeking to remedy when you provide amendments to the Constitution that they may be elected by the people.

Not only that, but the trouble with the State legislatures is that many of them are under the control of what is denominated in political parlance "the boss." Boss politics in this country on both sides, Democratic and Republican—and I am free to admit that we have it as well as you—boss politics finds its field of operations in the State legislatures to a large extent.

Now, that being so, if you take a State legislature that is popularly understood to be under the control of "the boss," do you suppose there would ever be in that case the chance to get an election of Senators by the people? "The boss" stands there with his grip on the legislature, directing them not to assent to an amendment which gives the right of election to the people. And the result will be that this amendment will fall flat. It never can pass.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does the gentleman think it right that we should change the whole form of this legislation simply to relieve Vermont of the "bosses?" [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. Well, I am happy to say to my friend that if Vermont is under any boss rule, it is the boss of the people. We have never had bosses up there, within my knowledge, until a week ago last Sunday, when a Vermonter fought the great battle of Manila; and if he were in Vermont to-day, he could not only control our legislature, but he could control every man, woman, and child in the State. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. And he is a Democrat. [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. I beg to assure my friend from New York that I have known Admiral Dewey from his boyhood up; and if there be a stanch Republican on the face of this earth, he is one. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman a serious question?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. In the line of what the gentleman has been saying about "boss" control of the State legislature and about the object of this resolution being in part to rid the States of such boss-ship, I want to suggest whether that boss-ship does not extend to the State convention as well as to the State legislature, and would not the State convention nominate the candidate for Senator?

Mr. POWERS. Unquestionably, Mr. Speaker, the State conventions would nominate the candidates for the Senate. The gentleman from Iowa inquires whether the "boss" would not control the State convention. Perhaps he might. But there is an appeal from the State convention to the people; and if any man secured his nomination to the Senate by the corrupt use of money or by any other corrupt method in a State convention, the appeal would then be taken to the people at large, and that iniquity would be corrected. But under the present system, where the action of the legislature is final, there is no opportunity for an appeal.

Therefore I say it is safer to leave the election of our Senators with the people, allowing them to adopt such methods by way of convention nominations or otherwise as they may see fit; it is safer to leave this question with the people, because the ultimate decision upon the force of a nomination would be determined by the people themselves.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One suggestion, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In reply to what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] has suggested, let me make this suggestion: Suppose a State convention should make a corrupt nomination, there is under the Australian ballot system still another appeal to the people than that suggested by the gentleman from Vermont. There is the right of nomination by petition. The people can nominate half a dozen gentlemen as candidates for the United States Senate from any State, regardless of what the State convention may do.

Mr. POWERS. A very excellent suggestion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the best way to test the mischief of our present system is to look at it in practical operation. It gives to the legislature of the State the right to discharge a function that is not properly a legislative function. The legislature of a State is called into being for the purpose of enacting laws for the government of the State. That is its primary function, the sole function which it should exercise. In many of the States, as I am aware, elective officers are chosed by the legislature, but the people after a time wipe that all out.

In my own State until the year 1850 every justice of the peace (a very ordinary officer) was elected by the legislature of the State, as well as every sheriff, every judge of probate, and all the county and local officials. But the people soon saw that the better way to elect those officials was by a vote of the people themselves. And so the constitution was amended. Only a few years ago—less than fifteen—our constitution was amended so that our State treasurer, our secretary of state, our auditor of accounts, should be elected by the people.

Prior to that time they were all elected by the State legislature. And to-day the judges of our courts are elected by our legislature for a term of two years. Now, while I agree that practically (except in my own case) that system has always resulted in obtaining good judges, it is nevertheless an undemocratic measure, a wrong measure. It allows the legislature—a small fraction of the people—to elect some of the more important officials of the States.

As I was saying, the legislative function is not, properly speaking, the choice of the elective officers; and that it is not wise to delegate to the legislature the choice of elective officers is shown in the fact coming within our own observation and recollection that in many of the States the whole time of the legislature is taken up in the election of Senators.

Mr. GAINES. And then they sometimes do not do it.

Mr. POWERS. Yes; they often fail to do it. By means of this system and the occupation of time which results, the people of the States are often denied those legislative enactments which otherwise they would have.

Nothing but the simplest matters of legislation are allowed to go through. Appropriation bills and other matters of great public importance are ignored, because of the fact that the members of the State legislature regard the other matter as more important. And if I am correct in my impression, the history of many Senatorial contests and elections has shown the fact to be that the election of United States Senators has been used to prevent even the organization of the State legislatures totally.

Now, Mr. Speaker, can such things be possible under the proposed amendment to the Constitution which we are now considering? Certainly not. The elections will not depend exclusively upon the members of the State legislatures. Does any man within the sound of my voice undertake to say that if the election of Senators in every one of the States where they have had such prolonged contests, and in some cases absolute failures, had been an election by the popular vote that a Senator would not have been elected in accordance with the law?

We saw in the case of Delaware, within a very recent period, how this thing operated. They failed to elect a Senator, and the whole time of the legislature was taken up with that question exclusively, and no other business was done. So when you undertake to engraft on the proper legislative functions of the legislative body the duty of the election of the United States Senator you necessarily set aside important matters of State concern and State legislation that ought to have their exclusive attention.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not a word to say about the present Senate. It would not be parliamentary if I had. But no man doubts that there has been in the Senate of the United States, in other times at least, seats secured by corrupt means. No man can doubt that. The great power of money, the great power of corporate influence, the great influences that arise in a thousand ways to control the actions of men have all operated, in the past at least, to secure seats for certain favored individuals in the Senate Chamber.

Now, when you take away these influences, when you take away the money influence, the corporate influence, you stop at once a proceeding that is not and should not be a part of our system. You may buy a few votes in the State legislatures so as to control certain elections, but you can not buy the votes of the whole people.

No man ever succeeded in doing that, Mr. Speaker. No corporate influence in this country has ever succeeded in corrupting the masses of the people. You may do it with a small body of men, but not with the great body at large. And if you could, the possibility is so remote that this change proposed in the fundamental law—a change in the mode of electing Senators—is a change in the right direction. It is a change that will minimize the dangers that now exist.

Now, I have no desire to advocate the change because of any animosity existing on my part, or in my section, to the present system. No complaint, so far as I know, has arisen that Senators from my part of the country were not properly chosen. But we do know, as a matter of fact, that there have been in other less favored localities charges of corrupt influences, or wrongdoing, in these elections which have cost immense sums of money and have entailed great inconvenience upon the people. And I think that everybody believes there is some foundation for the charges.

The proposition before us, Mr. Speaker, is to make a change in the Federal Constitution. I agree that we should go very slow in making changes in that sacred instrument. I am so constituted myself that at the start I should oppose almost every proposition to change the Constitution. But here is a change that presents itself strongly, in view of the practical and admitted evils that are apparent, to all of our people; and when such a proposition as this is presented for the consideration of this body, I feel justified in going somewhat further than I otherwise would in making a change in that instrument for the good of our people.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. As I understand the gentleman from Vermont, and as I understand the pending proposition, the difficulty now is as to the matter of securing concurrence between the two Houses, whether it is best that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama shall be inserted. In other words, the present practical proposition is whether it is more likely that the Senate will be content to accept the joint resolution with the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama or the joint resolution as originally reported.

Mr. POWERS. I will say to my friend from Missouri, in answer to his suggestion, that in a matter of so great importance as a change in the Federal Constitution it seems to me that we should insist upon a change that is right, irrespective of the question as to whether that change is likely to obtain favor in the Senate or otherwise. And further I will say that I have never believed and I do not now believe that the Senate of the United States will ever consent to any change of this kind, no matter what form you put it in. The only way the amendment will ever succeed before the people is by first taking action on the part of the State legislatures themselves.

My friend recollects that our Constitution provides two ways by which amendments to the Constitution can be adopted: First, by the submission of the amendments, by Congress, to the legislatures of the States, and a ratification thereof by a certain number of the States; and secondly, by the action of the legislatures themselves, primarily taken. In that case Congress is obliged to take cognizance of the demand.

Mr. TALBERT. In addition to the argument the gentleman from Vermont has made in favor of the election of United States Senators by the people, and in which I heartily concur, I would like to ask him if there is not another very important question to be taken into consideration, and that is the question of economy? It would be very much cheaper and promote economy on the part of the people to elect Senators in the manner suggested by this joint resolution. For instance, take the case of the State of Illinois. The contest there cost thousands upon thousands of dollars, and the same is true of Florida and other States.

Mr. POWERS. I intended to call attention to the Illinois case. The case in Illinois, to which my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] refers, was the election of Senator Palmer, I suppose. There was a practical illustration of the working of this popular method of electing Senators. The Democratic State convention nominated Senator Palmer as its candidate. The State of Illinois was canvassed by Senator Palmer, precisely as it would be expected to be done under this proposed change. Now, every member of the legislature and all the people of that State understood perfectly well that Senator Palmer or some other man was to be the United States Senator, so that they had a direct opportunity to vote their own choice in the election of a Senator.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Does the gentleman think that this proposition would go through the Senate if we pass it, and base our argument in favor of its passage upon the proposition that State legislatures have heretofore been corrupt in the selection of those Senators?

Mr. POWERS. I had already anticipated that when I said that I had no idea that the Senate would adopt any change in the present plan.

Mr. BLAND. I understand they have voted down another proposition. Are we to submit and pass nothing? The argument of the gentleman is that we should pass nothing because we can not accomplish anything.

Mr. POWERS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BLAND. My idea is that the Senate having voted down one proposition, we should try another. Probably we may get something.

Mr. POWERS. I will say to my friend that I am in favor of taking action. I believe my friend to be a pretty good illustration of the kind of legislator that sticks to his text, even though the signs of the times are unpropitious.

Mr. BLAND. The signs of the times are still good. [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. Very well. I have always admired my friend's courage. He always sticks to the doctrine that he preaches, no matter whether it rains or shines. Now, I would say in this connection that I believe in this change, and I believe the House, if it is favorable to this proposition, should adhere to the scheme of electing Senators by the people and thundering at the doors of the Senate until they at last accede to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Or until the State legislatures do.

Mr. POWERS. Or until the people of the States are sufficiently waked up so that their own legislatures will take the initiative measures to secure this amendment.

Now, I did not rise to say anything about the merits of this resolution itself, but to speak particularly in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. My view of the matter is that if you are going to make any change at all you ought to make it in the right way. Do not have one method of electing Senators in one State and another in another.

If it is desirable to have a change, it is desirable to have that change in every State in the Union, no matter whether the election of Senators heretofore in that State has been a happy one or not. It is to correct existing evils wherever you find them that this change is sought, and for my part I certainly hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will be adopted, and that we may send to the Senate a straight, single proposition which will provide all over this land for the election of our Senators in the way in which they should be elected, by the people themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, as I am paired with my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], I shall not be in a position to vote on this resolution or the pending amendments, but I feel a deep interest in them and have spoken on this subject in a former Congress. I would prefer this resolution with the amendment offered by my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. Failing in that, I would prefer it with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island. But if neither can be adopted, then I want the original resolution.

The arguments of the chairman of the committee reporting the bill [Mr. CORLISS] all apply to the broad proposition which would make me favor the bill with the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and his arguments are squarely on the line that the people of the United States can be trusted in the election of United States Senators. I believe in that doctrine. I am not going to attack the Senate or Senators, but I am sure that the people of the United States overwhelmingly believe that it would be better for the country and for legislation if Senators had to go through the rough and tumble of an election the same as members of this body do. If we can not trust the people of this Republic, it is time that we made an assignment of all of our assets to some contemptible old monarchy like Spain, or tender back our country to "the mother country." If that is true, let us get rid of the idea of a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people."

It is argued that if we send this joint resolution to the Senate it will never pass that body if amended as proposed. I believe in taking the right step in this matter, and the right step is this resolution as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. Its adoption will give a uniform rule for all of the States—the people to elect in each. And I would keep that proposition before the United States Senate until the thunders of the people make them surrender that bastile which defies the people on this proposition. [Applause.]

I have no doubt the fathers stood somewhat in awe of the beautiful Government that they had constructed, and thought that they had better have a sort of a brake at one end of the Capitol to hold the people in check.

Hence the restriction on the election of a Senator, and hence the length of term of a Senator, which length I admit gives Senators plenty of opportunity to be independent—yes, too independent of the popular wish. Of course, we in this body have got to bow to the people every two years to answer for the sins done in this Hall. In the Senate they can wait until the people cool off and get into a better temper if Senatorial action has displeased them. That is enough protection for the Senate. You or I will take the Senatorial toga with that restriction willingly. But the fathers did not know then what a grand structure they were building. They were stepping from monarchy—limited monarchy—into the pure air of freedom; and they were not themselves quite willing to trust the people that they were empowering with authority.

But, as I said before, if we can not run this Government by trusting the masses of the people, the single sovereign, we had better quit business and go back to the old days of monarchical power.

I hope that this resolution will be put through, and that we will keep it before the Senate until the people will give us a Senate that will pass it, and let the States have an opportunity to vote upon it. When it reaches that stage, I entertain no doubt but that it will be made a part of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Before the gentleman takes his seat; it has been suggested that there is some danger of the State legislatures not passing this provision. Will the gentleman give us his views upon that?

Mr. HENDERSON. I noticed that. State legislatures are in close touch with their own people and must respond to them; and there is no body that will respond quicker than a State legislature to the people, as a rule. If the people can not control their legislatures, then of course there is no hope for any reform by legislation.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I would like to suggest to the gentleman before he takes his seat, under the present organization of the Senate it was not voluntarily determined by the Constitutional Convention, but was the result of compromise.

Mr. HENDERSON. There was compromise all along the line in the Philadelphia convention.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The Senate as now organized was not the deliberate judgment of the framers of the Constitution.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was a compromise growing out of the fear that the framers had of great popular bodies electing Congress, and they thought that they must give a restraining power to the Senate. But restraint is no longer needed and never was needed in this country. The people are the source of all political power and must be trusted.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If it had not been for Mr. Hamilton, I have no doubt that the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people would have been provided for in the first instance.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill, amendment and all, very willingly. It removes a blot in our political system. It partly corrects unjust apportionments by State legislatures. We in New York are suffering from an apportionment which limited New York City, no matter what her population, to a certain number of representatives in the legislature. Eighty thousand voters in New York City may be required to elect an assemblyman, while 15,000 voters in a country county may suffice. In the State constitutional convention, dominated by a Republican majority, a few years ago, a clause was inserted which limited New York City, no matter how great her population, to one-third of the members in the legislature, and she pays to-day 54 per cent of the State taxes.

Repeatedly have the Democracy carried the State of New York—in one instance by nearly 70,000 majority—and under this unjust system of apportionment, which prevailed even before the adoption of the present State constitution, the legislature became Republican. With an overwhelming Democratic victory staring it in the face, that body elected a Republican United States Senator. I believe that the people should enjoy the fruits of their victory. They should elect the Senators, the same as they elect their State officers. Then you may have United States Senators who will represent the people and not monopolies, trusts, and the money power, who usually have the whip hand whenever a United States Senator is to be chosen. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, believing that the people of the United States would overwhelmingly pass this proposition if they could vote upon it, I shall heartily support it.

Let me call your attention to another State where a wrong system of apportionment exists. It is the State of Connecticut. Under its constitution the little town of Union, containing 112 voters, elects two assemblymen, while the city of New Haven, with over 100,000 inhabitants, is allowed only the same number. A small minority of the voters thus overpower its legislature and elect its United States Senators. Pass this proposition, and you will do much toward wiping out such false systems of legislation.
